PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, Thou hast made known unto us the way of life. Thou dost not rule from Thy far-off throne but by the spirit of grace and truth in the hearts of men. Thy law is the law of life. Thou dost not command but inspire. Thou dost not limit but lead. Thy rule is the rule of onward progress and success and glory for human life. The letter killeth; the spirit maketh alive. We come to Thee at the beginning of this day to ask for the spirit of truth and life in the hearts of Thy servants. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, February 21, 1916, when, on request of Mr. STONE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

POLSON, MONT., February 19, 1916.

To the PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

I beg to submit for your consideration the following facts advertent to the million-dollar appropriation that we are asking from the present session of Congress for the Flathead irrigation project.

The Joseph Dixon bill passed in March, 1909, providing for the formal opening of this reservation, carried an appropriation of $250,000 to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians and the unallotted irrigable areas to be disposed of under acts of Congress. At the special invitation of the Government, men and women from almost every State and Territory in the Union came here and entered upon these lands in good faith, expecting the Government to carry out its expressed and implied promises made to them at the time they entered upon these lands. After six years of watchful and prayerful waiting, many of them broken in health and fortune, this project is now about 25 per cent completed, and at the present rate that appropriations are being made it will require 25 years to complete this project.

The treatment accorded to the settlers upon this project has been manifestly unfair and not in accordance with the promises and pledges made them at the time they entered upon these irrigable lands. There is no more meritorious project in the whole Reclamation Service than the Flathead, and it is clearly the duty of the Government to come to the assistance of both the white man and the Indian and irrigate their lands and make it possible for them to provide a living for their families and meet the payments under their contracts. There is absolutely no justification for the dilatory methods that the Government has prosecuted in reference to this project, and the lands will amply stand for all expenditures, providing the work is carried on in a businesslike, expeditious, and economical manner. The irrigable lands of the Indian are just as valueless to him without water as to the white man, and as a result of the Government's failure to carry out its promises to these people at least half of the unit holders have been forced to abandon their lands and their homes stand out upon the prairie to-day as monuments dedicated to the memory of the inefficiency and the inability of a great Government to carry out its pledges to its people.

I maintain that it is criminal that these people should be permitted year after year to watch their crops dry up in the burning sun, while there is water in abundance almost in front of their very doors, flowing unused every hour of the day to the great Pacific Ocean. I am sure that Congress does not realize the great hardships and privations that these people have undergone to maintain their homes. The methods of the Government are resulting in the confiscation of the settlers' rights and their property, and it appears to me that the treatment accorded these people has not been in compliance with the doctrine and principles of our Constitution granting equal rights and justice for all.

I feel that our people have a grievance that is well warranted, and that their contentions are based on some considerable degree of equity and justice. There are no more patriotic people in the world to-day than the men and women who came here to cast their fortunes upon this reservation, and there are no people that would more gladly respond to the call to arms, and more cheerfully shoulder the musket and go to the front and fight in defense of their country than would the people under this project, and we feel that in view of the promises of the Government and the patriotism that invades our people that it is only fair that the Government should make some attempt to ameliorate the intolerable conditions which exist upon this reservation.

Our country is semiarid in character, and while thousands and thousands of acres in the foothills are annually yielding bountiful crops unaided by irrigation, as the rainfall in the mountains is far greater than on the prairie lands, and is aided by subirrigation which is constantly seeping from the mountain sides, however, in order to successfully grow crops on the irrigable portion of the reservation it is necessary to have water, as the rainfall is insufficient to justify the growing of good crops. It appears that some of our Congressmen, while not opposing this reclamation scheme, have bitterly fought our appropriation on the ground that they did not favor the manner of financing this reclamation scheme, claiming that it was not fair to use the Indian's money to irrigate the white man's land, while in some instances they themselves did not have clothes and the proper necessaries of life. As far as the unit holders are concerned it is immaterial to them how this project is financed and from whence the money comes so long as the Government carries out its promises made them and irrigates the land, and while the powers at Washington are discussing the best and most correct method of financing this proposition, our settlers are looking on and starving to death during the interval. It is a good deal like two men standing on the river bank watching some fellow struggling in the water and while they are devising the best means of saving him he drowns, and to-day while the Government is trying to devise the best means of financing this project our people are being starved out and forced to abandon their homes.

Now, Mr. President and Congress, we believe it is your duty to come to the assistance of these people and grant them this large appropriation that they are asking, and make the money available at the earliest possible moment. This project has been properly authorized by law, and the sooner it is finished the sooner the Government and the Indian will be reimbursed for the moneys expended. It appears to me that the reasons for asking for this appropriation are quite obvious, and in view of the foregoing facts I would most respectfully urge and recommend of the President and Congress that an appropriation of not less than $1,000,000 be granted for this project at the present session of Congress, that the work may be expedited and carried forth in a businesslike manner.

Respectfully sumbitted.

JAMES HARBERT,
Chairman Irrigation Committee, Polson Chamber of Commerce.

Barnett, of Indianapolis, Ind., commending the suggestion that vocational education be introduced among the troops in the Regular Army, together with resolutions passed upon the same subject by the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce. I do not

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 22, 1916.

Hon. HOKE SMITH, United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As chairman of the military committee of our chamber of commerce and a retired officer of the United States Army, I take this opportunity to write to you in regard to your military educational Regular Army bill which you introduced. The principal is just what I have advocated for some time in connection with the Regular Army. The part that I favor more strongly than any other part is the vocational educational feature. That feature will eventually be connected with our Regular Army, for it is right, and the Army has plenty of time for it and to perform all the military duties that it does perform at this time or ever has since I have known the Army. It will get a better grade of recruits and build up reserves.

On the 14th of last October we passed a resolution embracing the vocational idea through our chamber of commerce, a copy of which I inclose herewith. Our people would not object to a Regular Army of 250,000 men or more if this educational feature was connected with it, as it would be a school proposition and would stop deserting and give the men an incentive to do something and be somebody.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN T. BARNETT,
50 North Delaware Street.

The following recommendations are made by the military affairs committee, with the approval of the board of directors of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce:

Your military committee respectfully makes the following suggestions as worthy to be considered in connection with plans for national defense:

We believe that while there should be a reasonable increase in the Regular Army, provision should also be made for the acquisition, as rapidly as possible, for an adequate reserve force of trained and disciplined men, who can be called to the colors in time of war. As a means for the acquisition of such a reserve force we suggest the following:

1. Furnish each of the principal Army posts of the country with a complete equipment of shops and machinery such as are used in the various manual training, vocational, and technical schools of the country, together with a corps of competent instructors.

2. Provide that while a soldier shall receive all necessary training and instruction in the duties and discipline of a soldier to receiving instruction in some trade or vocation, by means of which he may earn a livelihood when he shall have left active service.

3. Extend the term of enlistment to at least six years, but provide that each soldier may, at any time after one year from the date of his enlistment, be released from active service and transferred to the reserve force, on his own application, on showing that he has not only become proficient in the duties of a soldier and that his record as such is good, but that he has also acquired sufficient knowledge of some particular trade or vocation to enable him to support himself by its pursuits, he being liable, however, to be called to the colors at any time during his term of enlistment in case of war.

4. We also renew our recommendations heretofore made for an increase in the capacity of West Point and the establishment of additional military schools, and again call attention to the need of a very large increase in the number of commissioned officers, and recommend that steps should be immediately taken to secure a sufficient number of trained and educated men for such positions, so that each department of the service and each unit of the Army shall at all times have its full complement of officers, with a sufficient excess to permit the detail of all officers necessary for the instruction of a National Guard and for military instruction at the several educational institutions of the country.

Supplementing the foregoing, your committee urges that immediate steps be taken to secure the active support of all Indiana Congressmen for the pending War Department measures, as amended by the Association of Military Schools and Colleges, entitled "An act to establish United States reserve corps officers' training schools."

5. Your committee also recommends, through the same channel, that steps be taken to require all land-grant colleges now receiving annual appropriations from the Government, to organize departments for instruction in military science and discipline where no such departments have heretofore been organized, and that all such colleges shall be required to conform to such uniform instruction and such standards as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War

We respectfully recommend that a copy of the foregoing be furnished to each of our Senators and to each of our Representatives in Congress, and that they be urged to use their utmost endeavors to secure the substantial incorporation of said ideas into any law that may be enacted to provide for national defense.

DAMS ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 157) to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. This is a local bill, and it will take but a moment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. STONE. The understanding and order—for it was the order of the Senate—adopted yesterday, I will read:

That when the Senate closes to-day's session it adjourn until noon to-morrow, and that no business whatever shall be transacted except ordinary routine morning business, and that at the close of that business the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ordinary routine business, by unanimous consent, when a report of a committee is made on a local measure of this sort, we can dispose of. This is a measure that can not be passed later than the 29th of this month.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist on an objection.

Mr. STONE. If it will not lead to any discussion——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not a word.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not a word, I assure the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to give the consent of Congress for the extension of the time allowed to the Twin City Power Co. to construct dams across the Savannah River, authorized by an act of February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912, until three years from the date fixed in the amending act for its completion, to wit, February 28, 1919.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE TUDOR CO.

Mr. ROBINSON. From the Committee on Claims, I report back adversely the bill (S. 4290) for the relief of the Tudor Co., and I submit an adverse report (No. 180) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, and also that the report and accompanying letter from the Auditor for the State and Other Departments be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report and accompanying letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following adverse report, to accompany S. 4290:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4290) for the relief of the Tudor Co., having had the same under consideration, report said bill adversely and recommend that the same be indefinitely postponed.

The attention of the committee has been called to the fact that, although this claim was payable upon presentation to the Treasury Department, its presentation to Congress and its reference thereby to the Court of Claims, under the Tucker Act, findings therein having been certified to Congress, render it necessary to move that an adverse report on the claim be made by the committee to the Senate before the department will feel justified in certifying the claim for payment. Because of the above reasons, your committee recommends that the bill be adversely reported and indefinitely postponed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 2, 1916.

JOHN RAUM, Esq.,
Stewart Building Sixth and D Streets, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to yours of the 21st ultimo, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, presenting claim of the Tudor Ice Co. for payment of the 1.529334 + per cent installment upon a judgment of the second class rendered in their favor by the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims against the Geneva award, and due under the provisions of the decision of the Supreme Court in One hundred and twenty-seventh United States, page 51, I have to say that although this claim was payable upon presentation to the Treasury Department, its presentation to Congress and its reference thereby to the Court of Claims, under the Tucker Act, and findings therein having been certified to Congress, render it necessary to move for an adverse report on the claim by the Committee on Claims of the Senate and the dismissal of the claim by the Senate before the department will feel justified in certifying the claim for payment.

The adverse report may state that it is based upon the fact that as soon as the claim is withdrawn from Congress the Treasury will at once certify it for payment in the sum of $1,553.13 out of a fund on hand for that purpose, this office having reported to the Court of Claims that the Tudor Ice Co is entitled to be paid that sum.

Respectfully,

E. D. HEARNE, Auditor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

IMPORTED MEXICAN PEAS.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance I report favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3536) to provide for the storing and cleansing of imported Mexican peas, commonly called "garbanzos," and I submit a report (No. 173) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to the report.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill just reported by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is a very short bill, and I ask for its present consideration. First I ask that the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the bill be read first.

The SECRETARY. The committee reports in favor of striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That under such regulations and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, bonded warehouses may be established in which imported garbanzos, wheat, barley, and other grains and seeds may be stored, cleaned, repacked or otherwise changed in condition, but not manufactured, and withdrawn for exportation without the payment of duty thereon: Provided, That the whole or any part of such imported garbanzos, wheat barley, or other grains and seeds, and the waste material and by-products incident to cleaning or otherwise treating said imported grains and seeds, may be withdrawn for domestic consumption upon the payment of the quantity so withdrawn of the duty imposed by law on such garbanzos, wheat, barley, and other grains and seeds in their condition as imported: And provided further, That the compensation of customs officers and storekeepers for all services in the supervision of such warehouses shall be paid from moneys advanced by the warehouse proprietor to the collector of customs and be carried in a special account and disbursed for such purposes, and all expenses incurred shall be paid by the warehouse proprietor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the bill up for consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to inquire whether there is any objection to the present consideration of it.

Mr. BORAH. I, perhaps, would not have any objection to its consideration if I could have a word of explanation from the Senator, but it is a long bill and seems to be of some importance.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. If it is to lead to any discussion I am perfectly willing to withdraw the request.

Mr. BORAH. I do not say that it will. I can not tell from the reading of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I can explain it in about a sentence or two. The bill I originally introduced provided that garbanzos, which are very edible peas grown on the western coast of Mexico, may be shipped into Arizona for cleansing for reshipment——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I see printed on the calendar the unanimous-consent agreement of yesterday:

Ordered, That on Friday, February 25, 1916, during the morning hour, no business whatever shall be transacted, except the ordinary routine morning business, and that at the close of that business the Senate will resume the consideration of Senate bill 3331, the unfinished business.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct, and I withdraw the request for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the calendar.

TRAVEL ON ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read and go over one day under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 14) was read, as follows:

Whereas a number of leading powers of the world are now engaged in a war of unexampled proportions; and
Whereas the United States is happily at peace with all of the belligerent nations; and
Whereas it is equally the desire and the interest of the American people to remain at peace with all nations; and
Whereas the President has recently afforded fresh and signal proofs of the superiority of diplomacy to butchery as a method of settling international disputes; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on unarmed belligerent vessels has recently received renewed guaranties of respect and inviolability; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on armed belligerent vessels rather than upon unarmed vessels is essential neither to their life, liberty, or safety, nor to the independence, dignity, or security of the United States; and
Whereas Congress alone has been vested with the power to declare war, which involves the obligations to prevent war by all proper means consistent with the honor and vital interest of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress, vested as it is with the sole power to declare war, that all persons owing allegiance to the United States should, in behalf of their own safety and the vital interest of the United States, forbear to exercise the right to travel as passengers upon any armed vessel of any belligerent power, whether such vessel be armed for offensive or defensive purposes; and it is the further sense of the Congress that no passport should be issued or renewed by the Secretary of State or by anyone acting under him to be used by any person owing allegiance to the United States for purpose of travel upon any such armed vessel of a belligerent power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the resolution goes over one day.

Mr. STONE. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma, in reference to his resolution, is his request that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. GORE. No; my request was that the resolution go over for the day under the rule.

Mr. STONE. The Senator's request is that the resolution lie on the table?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir. I wanted the resolution to take the regular course, under the rule, that all resolutions other than joint resolutions go over for one day. My purpose is to come within that rule under the regular order.

Mr. STONE. Let the resolution lie on the table then.

THE RIGHTS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. JONES. I submit a Senate resolution, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 108) was read, as follows:

Whereas this is a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and not of any individual, by any individual, or for any individual; and
Whereas it is contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government that the people should be involved in war through the decision or by the act of any one man; and
Whereas the Constitution of the United States of America expressly provides that "The Congress shall have power to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy"; and
Whereas the act of declaring war should not be merely the ratification and confirmation by Congress of the judgment and decision of a single man but should be the sober judgment and mature decision of the people through their representatives in Congress upon the causes and justification for such declaration; and
Whereas an assault upon the national honor would be a justification for a declaration of war; and
Whereas no one man is the sole custodian of the Nation's honor; and
Whereas the issue of war is too momentous and fraught with too grave consequences to the people to be decided by any one man; and
Whereas the people of this country are not seeking war and do not desire to be led into it, but, if involved, would be united as one man in support of the Government; and
Whereas by the arbitrary act or demand of its Chief Executive the people may be placed in a situation from which they can not withdraw without humiliation and be involved in war for causes the justice of which they have not been permitted to pass upon: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America that any issue claimed to affect the national honor should be referred for its decision to the Congress of the United States, and no ultimatum should be sent to any belligerent power and no severance of diplomatic relations be brought about by Executive action until after the advice and consent of Congress.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask that the whereases and the resolution may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was the request of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

HEIRS OF RICHARD SHAW.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 111), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs of Richard Shaw, late head waiter in the Senate restaurant, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

COMMISSION ON CHILD POVERTY.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 112), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Whereas proper preparation of our country for national defense demands the creation of conditions favorable to the birth and growth of healthy and sane men and women; and
Whereas recruiting officers of the military and naval service of the United States have reported that more than 50 per cent of the young men applying for enlistment are defective physically or mentally, or both; and
Whereas officers connected with other departments of the Federal Government have reported that widespread child poverty prevails in our country; and
Whereas child poverty, which may be defined as insufficient food and clothing and habitations detrimental to human life, is certain to produce weak, defective, and delinquent adults; and
Whereas this is the richest country in the world, blessed with abundant natural resources and a power of production unequaled in the history of the human race; and
Whereas child poverty and the consequent increase of unfit adults in the United States are due to conditions within the scope of legislation, and present a problem which should engage the attention of the Congress of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate, That the President of the United States appoint a commission of seven to inquire into child poverty, its extent, and its effect on the manhood of the Nation, its effect on the military and naval power of the Nation, and to make recommendations for legislation to abolish the conditions which produce child poverty and delinquent and defective adults.

Resolved further, That the commission include three surgeons, one from the military service, one from the naval service, and one from civil life, to serve without compensation.

UNIFORM STATE LAWS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I present a communication addressed to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], chairman of the subcommittee on land-mortgage loans of the Joint Committee on Rural Credits, by S. R. Child, chairman of the legislative committee of National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, which I ask to have printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not hear the request of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a communication from the chairman of the legislative committee of National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee on land-mortgage loans of the Joint Committee on Rural Credits, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], which I desire to have printed as a public document. I ask that the matter go to the Committee on Printing. I am not asking that it be acted upon at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

RURAL CREDITS IN NORTHERN FRANCE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I also present a report from the Hon. John Ball Osborne, American consul at Havre, France, on credit organizations for the farmer and tradesman in northern France, made in July, 1913, which I desire to have printed as a public document. I ask that the report be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

M'CLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO. (S. DOC. NO. 344).

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, on the 24th of June, 1914, Congress passed an act directing Gov. Goethals of the Panama Canal Zone to investigate the claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. against the Isthmian Canal Commission for extra compensation for constructing the lock gates for the Panama Canal. I have received a copy of the report upon the investigation of this claim, sent to me by Gov. Goethals, which I ask may be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if there are any illustrations in the report.

Mr. OLIVER. There are no illustrations. There is a great deal of matter in the report, but no illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 6918. An act to relieve Congress from the adjudication of private claims against the Government was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11 and 14, and agree to the same.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed; and, under the order of the Senate, the Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 3331.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask what is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The question is on that motion. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide. All in favor of the motion will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The motion is carried, and the Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 12 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on yesterday I had reached the point of the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which really was the main purpose of my rising to discuss the bill on yesterday.

The provision in the bill, as it is now, reads as follows:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

And then it provides for taking into consideration the benefits to the Government and the grantee.

The amendment of the Senator from Montana proposes to strike out the words "based upon its value as land," and empowers the Secretary of War to make such charges as he may consider reasonable. He may determine these charges by the value of the land that is taken, base them upon the land, or he may determine these charges by the amount of power developed, regardless of the character of the land or the value of it or the amount of it that is taken. He may base the charges upon the power developed, no matter how little or how great that development may be. He can fix any charge that he sees fit to make; and this is the proposition that I wish to discuss for just a little while.

This, I may say, is really the crux of the whole controversy with reference to water-power legislation. The question of giving to some Secretary or some administrative officer the power to fix such charges as he may deem proper has been, in my judgment, the real source of trouble and the real cause of the delay of legislation. If we can reach a proper conclusion with reference to this matter, I do not think there will be so much difficulty in adjusting the other questions. But there are those who insist upon vesting in some Secretary this almost unlimited power and who do not seem to be willing to make any concessions or have any legislation unless their ideas in that respect can be embodied in the legislation. In my judgment, to insist upon legislation of that kind is to defeat any legislation we may pass. If we put in a provision of that character, it will prevent the development of any of the water-power resources of the country.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] pointed out very clearly and very fully the great importance of legislation on this subject, the great resources that are lying undeveloped, and the great things that we hope may be done if this legislation is enacted. I can not add anything to what he said in that respect, but I do want to take a concrete example in our State that will show exactly what can be done, and will also show what varied developments can take place in connection with one of these dams.

Priest Rapids form a complete bar to navigation in the Columbia River in the State of Washington about 500 miles from Portland. By the construction of a dam 90 feet high, 400,000 horsepower can be developed at the low-water stage, which occurs in the wintertime, and 1,200,000 horsepower at high-water stage, which is in the summer, when water is needed and can be used for many different purposes. This power would furnish the electrification for half a dozen transcontinental railway lines crossing the mountains to the coast. Great nitrate plants would be established, manufacturing thousands of tons of fertilizer for our famishing lands and producing an abundant supply of nitrates so much needed as a means of national defense. Immediately tributary to this power development are 300,000 acres of land more fertile and productive when irrigated than the far-famed Nile, and these lands can be watered from the river by pumping, and cheap power could be furnished by pumping water from underground sources upon three or four hundred thousand acres more.

Mr. President, this is a very conservative estimate that I have given with reference to the lands that may be irrigated from this one point. There are many who figure that at least a million acres of this land, and possibly more than that, can be irrigated from this one source.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not that is a navigable stream?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes. The Columbia River is navigable.

Mr. WORKS. It has been assumed by a good many people here that we could not divert water for irrigation from a navigable stream. We know very well out West that that is frequently done, especially in the case of high water.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. How would the water be utilized or reserved in this case? Would it be carried into storage reservoirs?

Mr. JONES. No; it would be pumped out of the river by power generated here. By pumping water about 400 feet one body of land 150,000 acres in extent can be reclaimed. Then there are other tracts that can be reclaimed in the same way. I will say to the Senator from California that there is practically no limit to the development that can take place because of the amount of water in the river. With all the possible prospective needs of navigation, there is still an abundance of water at the low-water flow to permit it to be taken out upon these lands without in any way interfering with navigation.

The backwater from the dam would secure continuous navigation for 300 miles farther to the north and almost to the Canadian line. With the building of the dam and the construction of the necessary locks, the Columbia River will be navigable for a distance of almost 1,000 miles from the sea. The electrification of the railways will save thousands of tons of coal annually and greatly increase transportation facilities.

The reclamation of these desert lands means the establishment of towns and cities, the building of electric lines, the production of millions of dollars' worth of farm produce, and, above all, the building of homes for thousands and even hundreds of thousands of happy people. From 10 to 20 acres of these lands when carefully cultivated will support a family in luxury. These lands are now practically worthless. When settled upon, reclaimed, and cultivated, they will be worth a quarter of a billion dollars. The waters of the Columbia River have been going unvexed and unused to the sea for untold centuries, disturbed only by the murmur of the rocks over which they roll. These lands are almost as barren as the sands of Sahara and have been storing up the wealth of the sun for countless ages and producing nothing but sagebrush and supporting nothing but coyotes, jack rabbits, and sage hens.

To construct the dam, put in the locks, build the structures, and install the machinery necessary to develop the maximum amount of power will cost about $30,000,000.

It is a gigantic enterprise, with great risk and stupendous possibilities. There is no prospect of the Government undertaking it, even if it were desirable for it to do so. Private capital is said to be ready to undertake it if reasonable opportunity is given. If I controlled this great project, with all its attendant possibilities, if you controlled it, we would be eagerly seeking some one to develop it.

We would welcome capital to undertake it. We would offer all sorts of inducements to anyone who would begin it. Instead of imposing burdens we should be offering bonuses. Why can not we act in the same way as the agents of those who do control it, but will not develop it? What stands in the way? No one can put in this great dam without a permit from the Government. This power rests in the National Government in the interests of navigation and interstate commerce. Conserve these and its interests and power really end. The building of a dam sufficient for navigation purposes alone would leave the greater and more important possibilities untouched. In the exercising of the power over navigation or interstate commerce it is wise that every possible development be promoted and encouraged. If the Government can secure ample navigation without cost to itself, is it not most unwise not to do it? To use a common expression, "It should jump at the chance." The construction of this dam will overflow about 10,000 acres of land, which must be acquired by whoever constructs it. About 130 acres of this is public lands. They are practically worthless as they are now. Much of it might not even be needed for a reasonable and practicable development. The Government, in the interests of the public, wants the highest development, and these lands are needed. What would be the reasonable and the wise thing for the Government to do? What would you and I do? We would say to capital, "Come; put in your dam, furnish us the locks for navigation, and you can use the measly 130 acres for nothing," and we would blush at the niggardliness of the offer. That is what the Government ought to do, and that is the course which we, as its agents, ought to take. Instead, we are haggling over what we should charge for the use of this land. We assume that we are granting a most valuable right when giving capital a chance to invest in this enterprise.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day suggested that the Government in disposing of these valuable rights ought to get something out of it. Mr. President, it has not been the policy of the Government to endeavor to get revenue out of its public land. We have granted free millions and millions of acres of our land to homestead settlers. Why? Not because the lands were not valuable but because we wanted them improved, because we wanted them developed, because we wanted them converted into homes, and we felt that we could well afford for the prosperity of the country and for the development of its wealth and resources to donate these lands free to men who would go upon them and build up homes and cultivate them. Now, Mr. President, why should we not give a similar encouragement to the man who is willing to take his money and risk it in some of these great enterprises that mean so much to the country? As I pointed out, here are thousands of acres of public lands around this great possibility that are a waste, unsettled upon, unproductive, absolutely valueless. By the putting in of those dams the man who uses his money to do it makes it possible to develop these great resources. If we were willing, as we have been willing, to encourage the homesteader to go out on barren lands and develop them and build homes, why should we not also be willing to encourage capital to go into these great enterprises and develop them and make it possible for more homesteaders to secure homes and add greater wealth to the country? And especially, Mr. President, when we have provided the agencies all over this country in every State insuring to the consumers of this power reasonable prices, efficient treatment, and also providing that these men shall not get an exorbitant profit upon the money invested.

As a matter of fact, the favor is all the Government's and the risk all capital's. We get our navigation, and capital can get no more than a reasonable profit or return, and it may get less. If capital could do as it pleases after it gets this project, there might be some excuse for our imposing special burdens and restrictions upon it. It can not, however, exact exorbitant charges for its power. It has no one at its mercy. It can not amass an inordinate profit. Our public-service commission has full control over the rates and service, and it is charged with the duty of seeing that the rates are reasonable and just and the service efficient. The commission may not be perfect, but its members are just as competent and just as honest as any Federal officer or bureau chief, and it is directly under the eyes of the people interested, responsible to them, and can be depended upon to guard their interests as effectively as anyone else, if not more so. But it is said capital does not object to a charge for the use of the land, and the Senator from Montana said the other day that capital is ready to invest in these enterprises and is willing to pay a reasonable charge for the lands used. That is true. Why is capital willing to submit to this charge? Because it does not have to pay it. Who will pay it? The consumers of the power. When you insist on a charge for the use of the land, you insist upon placing a tax or burden upon every consumer for giving capital permission to make this great improvement.

I can not see the justice of saying that we will insist upon capital paying for the valuable privilege which we give at the risk of its money in these great enterprises when as a matter of fact whatever we charge must come out of the people who consume the power that is developed. I protest against it not in the interests of capital but in the interests of the consumers. The men who will pull the sagebrush, level the ground, build the ditches, and make homes on these sandy, hot, sagebrush plains will have enough burden to bear and enough charges to pay without having to pay for those worthless 130 acres of public lands overflowed by the building of the dam.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Is it not a fact that the amount which would be charged against the corporation would be charged up as a part of the operating expenses each year, so that the consumer would be called upon to pay back the total amount each year?

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. WORKS. And not to pay interest as in the case of capital invested?

Mr. JONES. That is true. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that point. I fear the interests of those to whom I just referred are overlooked by many who would shape this legislation. A prominent business man of my State who thinks a charge should be exacted wrote me the other day as follows:

I do not agree with you that tax imposed by the Federal Government on water-power development is paid by the consumer, for the good reason that the State public service commission fix these rates or are able to fix them.

He overlooks the plain and obvious fact that in fixing rates the public service commission must allow for all reasonable and necessary expenses. This charge is a certain and fixed expense and must be allowed in fixing rates just the same as the expense of labor. If no charge is made, then the expense to be allowed is that much less and the cost to the consumer is that much less. I may be very dull, but for the life of me I can see no justification from the people's standpoint for making any charge for the use of public lands necessary in the development of these great works.

Mr. President, Secretary Garrison, the late Secretary of War, made a statement before a committee a short time ago investigating this matter, and he has stated this proposition very clearly. I shall not take the time to read it to the Senate, but I ask permission to insert it as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SHALL A FEDERAL CHARGE BE LAID UPON THE PRIVILEGE?

Aside from any question of Federal authority that may be thought by some to be involved, in my judgment, and as a matter of policy, this question should be answered in the negative. Many who have the cause of conservation at heart have heretofore urged, and doubtless will urge again, that any legislation for the development of water power on the navigable streams should provide for the Federal levy of a charge for horsepower for the privilege. The reasons thus far advanced for the proposition do not appear to me to be sound. In the first place, it must be remembered that merely because the Federal Government makes, or ought to make, such a charge for the development of water power in streams running through the public domain, it does not follow at all that such a charge should be levied upon the development of water power in the navigable streams. The situations are basically different. In the case of navigable streams the Federal Government owns neither the water nor the bed of the stream; its power comes from a right to say what obstructions may or may not be placed in the stream. Upon a navigable stream the Government owns nothing, has nothing to sell, whereas the Government owns the power site itself upon the public domain.

Those who advocate the levying of such a charge first assigned as their purpose the accumulation of a fund to be devoted to the further improvement of navigation. This, it seems, has been abandoned, and the contention now made is that by means of this charge the Federal Government can more effectually exercise its control over the development. I have heretofore said that in my judgment the State should be left free to impose such taxes, charges, and excises as it might see fit to impose upon the property and the business authorized by the grant. I can see no sufficient reason, as a matter of policy, to justify the levying of an additional charge by the Government of the United States. The Federal Government does not qualify the grantee nor give him the primary authority to engage in the business. The property of the grantee is private property, situated within a State. The title is a title under local law, and the protection of the property comes from the local law, and not from the Federal Government. If such a Federal charge were levied, its only effect, so far as I can see, would be to increase the rates and charges to the ultimate consumer, for it can not be doubted that such fixed charges have to be shifted to the consumer, and directly so where there is public regulation and control.

I fail to appreciate how the levying of a Federal charge could render more effectual a proper Federal control in this connection. I know it has been argued that such a charge is necessary to take up the "slack," meaning thereby the difference in production cost between steam electric and hydroelectric energy. This assumes that there is a substantial difference which, at least at the present stage of development, may be doubtful, but excepting that there will generally be a difference in favor of hydroelectric energy, it does not follow that a regulatory commission, out of respect for the rights of property or otherwise, is bound to fix a rate that would enable the more expensive producer to continue his production. I see nothing in the cases, or in principle, requiring the State in the fixing of rates of service of electric energy to shut its eyes to the cheaper cost of production, but, on the contrary, if such a regulatory commission were not permitted to fix a rate, in view of the reasonable elements of valuation of a cheaper cost of production of a hydroelectric plant, or was limited in its regulatory power by the more expensive elements of production cost by steam, then regulation would be a delusion and the people could enjoy no advantage from the great natural resource of water power. I find no case where a State commission has accepted any such idea. On the other hand, a reference to the latest textbooks and cases on the valuation of the property of public-service corporations for rate-making purposes indicates that where the question in one form or another has come before the public-service commissions any theory that would permit the cheaper hydro company to take advantage of a steam company's cost of production has been denied.

Of course, if the two methods were upon a competitive basis in the same community and there was a substantial difference in the cost of production, cheaper production would prevail and finally exclude its competitors. This must be the result of natural and unassisted competition. The practical result would be, and it seems ordinarily must be, a monopolization of power, but subject to public control. Also, the hydroelectric producer will be compelled to purchase or erect a steam auxiliary of his own. There are very few streams whose flow is so constant and dependable as to permit of the development of hydroelectric energy without the assistance of steam plant. Fixing a rate for hydroelectric energy has to take into consideration this means of auxiliary production. In any event, it seems to me, to contend for a Federal charge to consume such difference of cost production is only to proceed upon the principle that no advantage can flow to the ultimate consumer from the cheaper production due to a natural resource.

IN THE CREATION AND IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGABLE CAPACITY AND NOT IN A MONEY CHARGE LIES THE GREAT FEDERAL BENEFIT.

To assume that the Federal Government will get no direct benefit, or will get less than it ought to get of such benefit, if it does not impose a charge upon the development of water power, is to ignore one great reason for and one great useful result of the development of power on the navigable rivers, namely, the creation and improvement of navigable capacity without expense to the Federal Government. That such development must give such a result is not a matter of speculation; it is a certainty. Such must necessarily be the result, and the larger and more general the development of power the greater will be the creation and improvement of navigation.

Power dams which create the head must necessarily result in the formation of pools available for slack-water navigation. Locks at the dam, which should be constructed by the grantee where it is equitable to impose such a condition, will connect up the pools with navigable reaches below, and thus the power development will result in creating not only isolated stretches of navigability above the dam, but may be made to create an extended and continuous navigable capacity, and without expense to the Federal Government.

The desirability and wisdom of river improvement by such means can not be open to question. A necessary national achievement can thus in a great measure be accomplished without resort to the Federal Treasury. It seems to me that those who look for returns for the Federal privilege can not fail to find it in this direct benefit to the Nation.

Mr. JONES. I concede, Mr. President, that we have not only the power but the right to impose a charge for the use of this land based upon the land and its value. Whether we should do it or not is a matter of policy about which we may differ. This land belongs to the National Government. Congress has the power and right to provide for its disposal. We can sell it outright or make a fixed charge for its use. The determination of this charge ought to be a simple matter, but the real controversy is over the method of determining it. The Senator from Montana and those who agree with him insist that the charge for the land should be determined by the power developed and imposed upon the power. We insist that it should be placed upon the value of the land itself and charged against the land. The power developed is within the jurisdiction of the State, and when we tax this power we invade that jurisdiction. By basing the charge upon the land we exercise the national sovereignty without invading the State's sovereignty. We have the power to tax the electric energy, but we have not the right to do it. By saying we have the power to do it I simply mean that we can say we will not grant any permit to build any dam unless a condition of this kind is put in.

If the Nation disregards the rights of the State because it has the power to do it, how can it expect the citizen to respect the law or the strong to regard the weak? Such a course is, in my judgment, most unwise as well as unwarranted by law or legal right.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator proposes to confine the charge to the value of the land, but there is a good deal of controversy as to what is to be taken into account in determining the actual value of the land. I have one concrete case in mind, where that question arose in my State, where a tract of land covering several hundred acres was peculiarly fitted for a reservoir site, with an excellent place for a dam below it. A suit was brought to condemn it. The land was practically worthless for any ordinary purposes, but the supreme court held in that case, and I think the Supreme Court of the United States has held, that the uses to which the property might be devoted should be taken into account. In that case the owner of the land got several hundred thousand dollars for land that was practically worthless.

Does the Senator think it would be wise to make any such charge upon that basis? Take the case he has already cited, where the land for reservoir purposes would be of immense value with the things that could be done, as stated by the Senator, by putting in a dam or other necessary diverting works. That might impose an immense charge upon the consumer.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it would be wise, but I admit we have the right to do even that. I do not think it would be wise. My position I have stated two or three times. I do not think we ought to put any charge upon it at all.

I further most seriously object to the plan of the Senator from Montana and those who agree with him, in that they would leave to the determination of an administrative officer the policy to be followed in levying this charge, not only to the amount but as to the manner of its levy. They would say to the Secretary, "Make a charge if you think it wise, and you fix the amount and you say how it should be determined." This is wrong. It is the duty of Congress to say whether or not the charge should be levied. It is our duty to determine how it should be arrived at, and it is our duty to fix the amount as nearly as possible. We are the legislative body. The policy to be followed by administrative officers should be settled by us. We know what we want to do, or we should know, and we should do it. The responsibility is ours, and we should discharge it. If we want the charge based upon the power developed, let us say so. If we want it based on the land, as it should be, let us say so. If we want it based on the power, we should fix the amount, or, at least, the maximum amount that the administrative officers may impose. If we want these enterprises undertaken, let us not place it within the power of an administrative officer to stifle them.

Mr. President, I said awhile ago that I agree with the Senator from Montana that capital is not objecting to this charge. It is willing to pay it, because it takes it out of the consumer. What capital does object to, however, is the uncertainty that rests in giving to an administrative officer unlimited power with reference to fixing the charges and determining the policy of levying them, and all that sort of thing. If we pass this law with a provision in it, as there will be, with the amendment of the Senator from Montana adopted, there will not be any investments under this act.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield again to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator has stated, as I understood him, more than once that the corporation will not object to this charge; but might there not be a case where the charge would be such that it would be impossible to operate the plant?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. Thereby making the prices to the consumer prohibitory.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; that is true.

Mr. WORKS. So there may be a good reason why the corporation itself should object.

Mr. JONES. That is true. Of course they say, "We will not object to a reasonable charge."

Now, I want to give you an example of administrative rate making or charge fixing. I want those who think that the administrative officers will put low charges and make it easy for the consumer to notice this example that I will submit to you.

In 1906 we passed an act granting a permit to the Pend Oreille Development Co. to build a dam across the Pend Oreille River, in the State of Washington, and set out the conditions under which it should be built. They were not able to get the work started within the time limit fixed. Then in 1907 we passed an act extending the time for beginning the work, and still they were not able to get to work. In 1912 we passed another act extending the time further. They had all their plans and specifications prepared, and these were satisfactory to the Secretary of War. It was found, however, that they would have to overflow some public lands unreserved and some in a forest reserve. So they had to go to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture to get permits to use these lands. This illustrates what would happen if we had a provision in this bill such as has been tried to be inserted in it, giving the Secretary of the Interior jurisdiction along with the Secretary of War.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior absolutely refused to grant any permit to use this land under the laws that we had passed, except upon certain conditions. They worked over the matter all winter, and finally got an agreement that the people representing the capital to build the dam thought was reasonably satisfactory. They thought they could get the money and do the work under it, and they made this agreement. It was signed and we had it printed as a public document. I suggest that it might be interesting to those who are interested in this matter to look at that document. It is Senate Document No. 147, Sixty-third Congress, first session. They fixed a sliding scale, similar to that suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] yesterday, to determine the payments that these men should make to the Government. The possible power development at that point was 110,000 or 112,000 horsepower. About 200 acres of public land were necessary to be taken. Now, here are the charges that had to be paid to the Government upon a full development of that water power by these people if they carried it out. If they sold their power at less than 2 mills a kilowatt hour the charge for horsepower would be 5 cents, or $27.50 per acre for the use of this public land. If they sold their power for 2 cents and over per kilowatt hour the charge per acre would be $2,750 a year.

They tell me that the charge here in Washington City per kilowatt hour for power is 10 cents. I am told that by those who claim to know. I do not know anything about it. The highest charge that they contemplate here is 6 cents per kilowatt hour. If this were the charge made for the use of this power, what is the rental that they have to pay to the Government per year for this land? It would be $24,750 an acre per year. That is a sample of administrative departmental fixing of rates to be charged for the use of power.

Let me call attention to the fact that in this permit they provide "that in determining said total annual receipts there shall be included for any electric energy used by the permittee at a price which shall not be less than 2 cents per kilowatt-hour." This would indicate that they thought that possibly that was about the minimum rate at which this power could be furnished. What would be the charge per acre based on that? It would be $2,750 an acre, not a nominal sum to say the least of it, and I think the consumers would have to bear the burden of that.

Then they provide here that "unless otherwise authorized by the Secretaries, the maximum price at which electric energy developed by or transmitted from the power project may be disposed of to customers or consumers shall not exceed 6 cents per kilowatt-hour." In other words, they thought possibly they would sell their power at 6 cents. I called your attention to what the tax would be—over $24,000 an acre per year at that charge.

I should like to place in my remarks the table in this permit fixing the compensation to be paid to the Government and the computation that has been made as to the price that would be paid per acre on these various charges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 8. No compensation for the permission given will be required prior to the year 1923; but on or before the 1st day of February in each year, beginning with 1924, the permittee shall pay, by certified check to the order of the Secretary of the Interior, or in such other manner as the Secretaries may direct, an amount calculated from the total capacity of the power site at rates per horsepower per year varying directly as the square of the average price for electric energy charged to customers and consumers of the permittee as determined in subsection (c) hereof and varying inversely as the square of the proportional development of the power site, as shown by the following table:

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is no reason why the charge, whatever it may be, should not be the same in connection with any project. Capital gets no advantage from it, because under the laws of the State its profits can only be reasonable and just, no matter what the charge may be. I will say frankly—and in this some of my friends may not agree with me—but I will say frankly that I would join with the Senator from Montana rather than see legislation fail upon a provision fixing a maximum charge for the use of the land, possibly 25 cents a year per horsepower, which I understood him to say the other day had been reported and agreed to by the Public Lands Committee in connection with the bill relating to power development on nonnavigable streams.

I would simply agree to that as a basis for determining what should be paid rather than to have no legislation. If we could fix the amount at a reasonably low rate and make it definite and certain, then I can not see any more objection to it in principle than there is to charge for the value based upon the land.

The Senator from California called attention a while ago to some circumstances where it was based upon the land where the charge might be high because of the peculiar circumstances and the peculiar value of the land for certain purposes. That is true. So, when I am willing to make a concession of even this kind I do not think I am conceding really the principle for which I contend, that we should not make any charge except for the use of the land, and it ought really to be based upon the land.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad to say that rather than that the legislation should fail I would see the thing go through with the Senator's view.

Mr. JONES. I was satisfied that would be the view of the Senator from Montana based on that.

In any event, however, we should determine the policy to be followed and fix the rates to be charged as nearly as may be. We know what is wanted and what is needed. Let us do it. It is our duty to protect and promote the people's interests. It is for the administrative officers to execute the laws we pass and those laws should be so framed as to leave nothing to be done but their execution. Administrative officers can not be blamed for seeking power. We should be blamed for abdicating. Administrative officers can not be blamed for seeking to determine policies. We are to be blamed for encouraging them to do so. They are not to be blamed for making or asserting policies. We are to be blamed for not doing so ourselves. This has gone a long way. This administrative branch of the Government has almost as much, if not more, influence over legislation and policies than the legislative branch itself. We are told by departmental officers that we can do this or we can not do that. A departmental officer said a few days ago that we could not pass a certain bill if we put a certain provision in it or unless we put a certain provision in it. They come here not to give us information but to tell us what to do and what not to do. I do not criticize them for it. They have a right to congratulate themselves upon their power and influence. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves. We are to blame for this state of affairs, and the only way to correct it is for us in the laws we pass to declare our will, to fix the policies we want followed, and specify what we want done. When a question is up for legislative solution, instead of saying, "This should be done in accordance with rules and regulations to be fixed by the Secretary," if we will determine ourselves how it should be done, even if it takes time and study, we will soon gain the respect of the people that we should have and administrative departments of the Government will discharge their true functions.

The effect of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana would be to give the Secretary unrestricted power in the fixing of charges. The real purpose was advanced by Mr. Pinchot and others a few years ago, but not much has been said of it lately. The Senator from Nebraska frankly stated it yesterday for the first time in this debate. What is the purpose? Not revenue. That is unimportant. Its purpose is regulation. That sounds good. We have regulated capital and big corporations, and wisely, and so anything that is called regulation is looked upon with favor, but what does it really mean in this instance? The Secretary is to be given authority to regulate the development and disposal of water power and electrical energies by imposing a tax upon its production. Miraculous! Who ever heard before of regulation by taxation? For whose benefit? Of course it is claimed that it will ultimately benefit the consumer. If any consumer can figure out how it will benefit him to put a tax on the power he must buy, he will certainly have cause for rejoicing.

What is really proposed is equalization and not regulation. They propose to raise to the consumer the price of cheap power to the level of costly power. That does not sound so well as regulation, but that is what they propose to do. This was frankly stated yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska. He cited an example, saying that if there is a plant that cost $10 and there could be put in under this bill a plant that would cost $5, we ought to put on a tax to raise it up to the level of the $10 production.

If a field is occupied now by a plant that must expend $50 per horsepower in production and a plant could be put in under this bill to cover that field that could produce power at $30 per horsepower, they propose to put a tax of $20 per horsepower on that produced by the new plant, so that it can not undersell the established plant. This power is in the interests of property rights instead of consumption and means one of two things: Either no new plant will be put in and the existing plant will continue to monopolize the field and the consumer get no relief or the new plant will charge the same as the old and the consumer will still "pay the piper."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. While the Senator is discussing that feature of the question let me put to him this concrete situation: As he is aware, the Milwaukee Railroad are now operating 115 miles on their main line by electricity, and by the 1st of June they will be operating 450 miles by electricity. The other competing lines, the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, will, of course, want to operate electrically, if they can, in order to meet the competition that they must encounter from the Milwaukee road. There is a power site, we will say, that is available for the use of both of the other roads, the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific; both of them are asking for that site, and it is awarded to the Great Northern. The Northern Pacific must continue operating at the present high cost, while the Great Northern will be operating at 33⅓ per cent less than that cost. How can you regulate freight rates in that condition of affairs?

Mr. JONES. How can you regulate them by putting a tax on it?

Mr. WALSH. You would require the Great Northern to pay such an amount as would in a way equalize and take up the difference or you would drive the other institution out of business absolutely.

Mr. JONES. I do not think you would drive the other out of business. They are not going out of business now when there is no tax put on, and I think we could regulate rates so that those roads that do not have electrical power could charge, of course, reasonable rates over their lines. They may lose some business, but that is one of the inevitable results of competition and of cheaper production, cheaper power, and cheaper ways of handling commerce. We ought not to raise the Milwaukee's rates and charges to its shippers simply to keep them on the same level with the shippers who have to use the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific, for in such case the consumers would not get any benefit from the development of our national resources; it would not amount to anything to them whether they were developed or not. We might probably get a little bit for the Treasury, and yet nothing at all commensurate with the difference that the people of the country would have to pay in increased rates. This is the ideally perfect working of this proposed system. Its actual working would more likely be as follows: Instead of putting on a tax of $20 a tax of $5 will more likely to imposed, and the company will put in its pocket the other $15 and the consumer will still whistle to keep up his spirits. This is regulation by taxation under the name of conservation.

In the example supposed by the Senator from Nebraska yesterday he said that if there is a power plant that must charge $10 for its power, and if another one was put in under this bill that would furnish power for $5, the Government ought to exact a dollar, and he said that the company producing at a low rate would probably raise their rate to about $9.50, so as just to undersell the other company, and that then the Government ought to exact a dollar. Well, suppose it exacted a dollar. Would we permit this other company to take the other $3 or $4 above the cost of production? Yet that would be about the actual practical workings of the system proposed for a regulative purpose, and that is the only basis on which I am discussing this now.

But what of the power of the State commission over rates? Would it be prevented from putting the rates of the new plant upon a just and reasonable basis regardless of the cost to the old plant? Surely not. Would the Senator from Nebraska contend that, under the example suggested by him, a public service commission of a State ought to permit the company that produces power at $5 a horsepower to charge up to $10 because it cost another plant $10 to produce it?

It would reduce the rates to a reasonable and just compensation and the old plant would be put out of business and the purpose of the so-called tax regulation would be defeated as a regulator. It would be a failure and the net result would be an unnecessary burden upon the consumer.

I hope the full significance of this proposal to the consumers will be grasped by them. It proposes to compel them to pay the same price for cheaply produced power that they must pay now for costly power. It means no benefit to them. This may be conservation, but deliver me from it. It is not the conservation that the people desire.

In connection with that, Mr. President, I want to insert—I shall not take time to read it unless some Senator should desire it read—a statement from Commissioner Halford Erickson, of the Wisconsin railroad commission, discussing this very point, and also a statement from Mr. A. H. Foote, former president of the National Tax Commission, discussing the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Commissioner Halford Erickson, of the Wisconsin Railroad Commission, on this point says:

"This brings us to that feature in local regulation which often finds expression in a rental charge or a toll upon the earnings of the utility over and above the regular tax assessment. Such rental or toll is sometimes spoken of as a sort of profit-sharing plan * * * and is often pointed to as an example of wise local regulation and as something to take the place of other regulation. Closer analysis of the facts from an economical and social point of view indicates quite clearly that this toll is in effect a tax levied upon other than sound principles of taxation and that it is an unwise burden upon the service of the utility.

"The primary reason why franchises are granted to public utilities is to promote the welfare and comfort of the public as users of the utility service rather than the subservance of the interest of the public as taxpayers or because these utilities become a source of revenue. These propositions appear to be sound. If this is the case * * * then it follows that the operation of the utilities and the regulation of the same should also be in the interest of the taxpayers * * *. If the taxpayers and the users of the service were the same persons, and if there also was a close relation between the amount thus paid as taxes and the use made of the service, then it would make but little difference whether the toll was levied or not; but this is not often the case * * *. Tolls become as much a part of the cost of service as the taxes levied in the ordinary way. Taxes are based on the ability to pay, and this ability is measured either by the value of the property or by the income.

"The toll in question is levied without reference to these principles. It is placed in a lump sum upon a service where it must be borne by those who use this service in proportion to the use they make of it, whereas in the street railway field the users are largely made up of workers. This toll also falls on those who are least able to bear it."

Mr. A. H. Foote, former president of the National Tax Commission, says:

"If the purpose of those who advocate a franchise tax is to secure the best possible results for the people from the operation of the franchise granted, their proposition is unsound, because a franchise can not be taxed without adding the amount of the tax to the cost of service rendered. In exercising its reserved right to regulate rates the State must take into consideration this tax addition to cost, as the rates it fixes or approves must cover all costs of ownership and operation and yield a reasonable profit. For this reason a tax on a franchise is not a tax on the corporation, but is a tax on the users of the service it renders. * * * It is the method of plucking feathers from a goose without exciting a perceptible squawk. In fact, by reason of being inadequately informed or by being misunderstood, a franchise tax is a tax demand made by users, or rather by political vote seekers. It is a form of indirect taxation that has no proper place in the economical policy of intelligent, honest-minded, and self-governed people."

Mr. JONES. But, Mr. President, this is not all. Under the plea of regulation would be enthroned an administrative despot. You place in the hands of the Secretary the power to make and unmake business, the power to favor this company as against that company, the power to advance this community and retard that community, and you open the door to all sorts of graft and corruption. This was frankly stated by the Senator from Nebraska, although not exactly in these words, but the examples which he pointed out fully warrant these conclusions.

We will not have a corrupt or ignorant Secretary, but very little of this work would be done by the Secretary if he were given the power. No Secretary could look after the details. He would depend upon subordinate and special agents. They would generally be honest, but their experience would be slight. They would not be able to get at the real cost of production, and sharp managers would deceive them, and the result would be unjust and unwise action by the Secretary. A dishonest agent could very easily connive at fraud and deception. He could very easily submit a high estimate of the cost for a small share of the profit and no one be any the wiser. No, Mr. President; the people do not want such a law as that. They do not want such power, having such possibilities and purposes, placed in the hands of any administrative officer, and no administrative officer should desire such power, especially when he must depend so much for his action upon others. Those who propose this plan do not intend such consequences, but I can see no escape from them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator passes from that point, Mr. President, I should like to address a question to him. Does not the bill as it stands repose in the Secretary of War this extraordinary power?

Mr. JONES. Well, it does to a certain extent; I admit that; but I desire the Senator to remember that I said that personally I should like to see that provision entirely cut out. We have put a limitation on, and if we can make the limitation any more definite or any more certain, I want to do it; but we do say in the bill that the Secretary of War, in determining these charges, must base them upon the value of the land. If the Senator from Montana can suggest anything more definite to meet my views, I shall be glad if he will do so, and I will offer it. Personally, however, I should like to see that cut out entirely, but I am willing to accept this much as a compromise in order to get some legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I recognize the unfortunate necessity of reposing in some officer of the Government the power to say, as between two contesting applicants, which one of them shall have the privilege; but that inheres in the nature of the thing, does it not? The Senator has not proposed any plan by which that may be avoided.

Mr. JONES. I think, Mr. President, that we have a much more restricted plan in the bill than it would be if the Senator's amendment should be adopted. That is what I am contending, and my argument now is going more to the proposition of putting a tax on for the purpose of regulating than to anything else.

Mr. WALSH. The question I arose to present to the Senator was whether the argument he is now making is not equally applicable to the whole theory upon which the bill is built?

Mr. JONES. No; I think not, because we have tried to fix it. We have laid down certain limitations which, construed in a reasonable way and in any but an arbitrary way by the Secretary, I think fix a pretty definite rule by which to determine the charges.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. As I understand the Senator, of course the weak point in government is that ofttimes-necessary twilight zone of discretion which can not be entirely eliminated, but the more thoroughly it can be eliminated, the more automatic law can be made, the better; and what the Senator is contending for in this bill is reducing the zone of discretion to the minimum just as far as that can be done.

Mr. JONES. That is it exactly, stated much better than I could state it.

There is, to my mind, another serious objection to such a provision. The policy being followed in fixing rates, both as to the basis and the manner, is left entirely to an administrative officer, who changes with every administration and many times oftener. The administration of a law should be stable and uniform; but with this power reposing in the Secretary, the policies put into effect by one Secretary may be along one line and along an entirely different line under another Secretary, according to the views held by the different individuals. Take the provision in the bill as it is now. No Secretary can follow the law and change the basis of fixing the rates from the land to something else. If he goes from the land as the basis of fixing the rates under the bill as it is now drawn, he violates the law; and we do not have any right to assume that any Secretary will do that; but, under the provision as it would be if the amendment of the Senator from Montana were adopted, one Secretary may base the charge on the land taken, while another may base it on the power developed. One may think he ought not to use it as a regulator; another may think he ought to do so. One policy will be applied to-day, another to-morrow. One at this plant, and another at that plant. The Secretary will be charged with favoritism here and with corruption there, and the whole system be brought into discredit. Surely this is not desirable. I can not believe that Congress will be so careless of its rights and duties as to legislate in this way.

Mr. President, I now come to the very point which the Senator has suggested. The provision of the bill is not as definite as I would like, but it declares the legislative purpose to be to fix the charge for the use of the land upon the value of the land itself, and directs the Secretary of War to take into account the benefits to the Government as well as to capital. This practically indicates that no charge should be made, because it is hard to conceive of public lands being taken of the value of the locks that may be required for navigation. It also seems to be the policy under the policy of fixing the tax for the use of the land on the power developed to fix the tax at what it is thought capital can bear, regardless of the amount of land taken. Under the Columbia River project 10,000 acres will be overflowed, of which only 130 is public land. How would they arrive at the charge to be fixed? They will charge just the same as if the whole 10,000 acres were public land. That is what they did in the agreement to which I have referred with reference to the Pend d'Orielle. There was not any discussion or consideration given to that agreement with reference to the amount of land taken or with reference to the value of the land taken, but it was all upon the power that might be developed. That is unfair, unjust, and unreasonable. It is a stand-and-deliver proposition pure and simple.

Mr. President, this legislation is proposed in the hope of getting something done under which capital will invest in these great enterprises. It is proposed in the hope that we can secure actual conservation by the use of great natural resources that are now unproductive and not used. The members of the committee have made concessions here and concessions there, not only to each other but to the sentiment which they know to exist throughout the country with reference to the provisions that should be placed in laws of this character.

This bill is not a perfect measure, and I want to say for myself—and I am satisfied that it is the sentiment of the whole committee—that any amendments which may be proposed which will help to accomplish the objects and the purposes with reference to these great enterprises which everybody desires undertaken, will be welcomed to this bill. We have been animated in the preparation of this measure with the same spirit as that stated by Secretary Garrison before the committee, and I wish to close by simply reading what he said:

> In my judgment, however, the most potent influence against the enactment of beneficial legislation has been the honest apprehension that in the encouragement of development we might concede too much, might yield that which the future would show to have been a harmful and improvident gift; might, by the improvident creation of a definite and settled relation between Government and grantee, tie the hands of Government and prevent it from making hereafter the most of a magnificent resource in the interest of all the people. But mere apprehension will no longer justify nonaction. The facts should be known to us to-day. The country calls for action. Nonaction can not be excused by the plea that we, whose duty it is to act, are afraid to trust ourselves to act. There is a demand for legislation. We must honestly examine such apprehension as we may have in the light of facts and of reason. If they are without substance we must abandon them. * * * The subject, viewed from whatever angle, is one of such vast importance to the country as a whole, that we can not evade it, but must approach it free from illusions and preconceptions and without the timidity which is born of undue apprehension. We must approach it and study it with the hope and desire of accomplishment. Theories concerning it must be tested in the light of experience and sound common sense. * * * We can not, as fair-minded and reasonable men, desirous of accomplishing a great good, fail to agree upon the means to be employed when we are all agreed as to the great result that ought to be achieved—namely, the beneficial development of water power.

Mr. President, that is the spirit which has animated the committee in framing this bill and reporting it to the Senate in the form we have done.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. In the press of other matters I have not had the time to examine this bill as carefully as I should like to do. So I ask what provision, if any, is made in the bill for the termination of the right or license or permit or whatever you may be pleased to call it?

Mr. JONES. I will answer that by reading the provision of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to say, for the information of the Senator from Minnesota, that there will be some discussion of an amendment addressed to that feature of the bill, and doubtless it will engage the Senator's attention at that time.

Mr. JONES. I read from the bill:

> SEC. 5. That unless revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act the rights under any such permit shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completing and putting into commercial operation of the initial installation required by the Secretary of War, as provided in section 9 of this act, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act or until terminated and compensation has been made to such grantee for its property as provided in section 6 of this act.

Then section 6 follows. I could read that right here, if the Senator would like to have me do so.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have it in the Senator's speech. I have a purpose in wanting it there.

Mr. JONES. Very well; I shall read section 6. It is as follows:

> SEC. 6. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceabue in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, and assuming all contracts entered into by the grantee which have the approval of the duly constituted public authority having jurisdiction thereof, or which were entered into in good faith and at a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances existing at the time such contracts were made.

And then it goes on with the definition of "fair value," and so forth.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him a question or two. My recollection is that he made a statement with reference to the Columbia River and the power that might be developed there under the provisions of this bill. I understood him to say that a dam erected there, perhaps 100 feet high——

Mr. JONES. Ninety feet high.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Ninety feet high would produce—what amount of power?

Mr. JONES. Four hundred thousand horsepower at low-water stage and 1,200,000 horsepower at high-water stage, or during the summer time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the Senator to make a statement as to the distance the river would be improved for navigation by the construction of this dam, which was about a thousand miles, I think he said.

Mr. JONES. I said that by the construction of this dam there would then be navigation in the Columbia River for a distance of about a thousand miles. Perhaps it might be well to explain that; otherwise it might be misunderstood. We have navigation now in the Columbia River up to Priest Rapids. Then for, I think, 75 miles or more there is not any navigation, because there are some rapids. By the building of this dam, those rapids would all be overcome, and then we would have navigation nearly on to the Canadian line.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I understood. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: There is obstruction to navigation; there is a great navigable river cut in two in the middle, if I may so express it, by shoals. The construction of this dam 90 feet high would give complete navigation.

Mr. JONES. Without expense to the Government.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Without expense to the Government. Now, the point I am coming to is this: How long will it be, in the judgment of the Senator, before the Government of the United States will undertake the improvement of the river at its own expense?

Mr. JONES. Why, Mr. President, I see no prospect at anything like an early day of the Government undertaking it. It will be years and years and years before it is done, if it ever is done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Another question. If the Government should undertake this development for navigation purposes they would, of course, construct, instead of one dam 90 feet high, three or four dams 20 or 25 feet high for navigation only. That is the rule. The Government never constructs high dams when they are only providing for navigation; but the rule of practice and of common sense is that such dams shall be only 20 or 25 feet high. I do not know of any dam in the United States for navigation that is over 22 feet high. Now, to construct these dams for navigation would absolutely for all time destroy the possibility of a power development at that shoal, would it not?

Mr. JONES. I think it would.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In the Senator's judgment, would not power development and the results that would follow it be much more beneficial to the people of that section and the whole country than the navigation of the river itself? Would it not bring more beneficial results?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; because there is not very much need for navigation, at least along a hundred miles or more, unless we can get water out on these lands for irrigation purposes; and this is about the only way in which it can be done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then the improvement of that rapid, the construction of a power dam, the erection of manufactories of different sorts, the irrigation of lands, and the production of crops would create an immense amount of commerce that would go over the river made navigable by the construction of this dam; would it not?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I wanted to get clearly in my mind. I did not know, but I had that impression.

Now, another question: Is it the Senator's opinion that under the provisions of this law, practically as we have drawn it, capital can be induced to make that power development and make that navigation improvement in connection with each other?

Mr. JONES. I am assured, by men who claim to know, that they know capital that will go into this enterprise if this bill is passed; and not only this one enterprise in my State, but this other enterprise in the case of which I read from the permit awhile ago, where they can develop 110,000 or 112,000 horsepower. I am assured that they have capital ready to go into that enterprise also. What these capitalists expect to do more than anything else is to build great nitrate plants to take nitrogen from the air and make fertilizer out of it, and also develop those things that are necessary in the manufacture of ammunition, and which, if we need to prepare, as so many are talking about now, will be one of the best elements of preparation that we can make.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would not the Senator from Washington regard it as a legislative crime for the Government of the United States to destroy that power and its possibilities simply by an attempt on the part of the Government to improve the river for navigation?

Mr. JONES. I think we would be justified in using that language.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I wish to state that I have been unable to be here during all of the Senator's speech; but, referring to the question asked by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], I do not know whether the Senator from Washington has discussed section 6 or not.

Mr. JONES. No; I did not discuss it. The Senator's colleague [Mr. CUMMINS] asked me yesterday afternoon with reference to the fair-value proposition. I suggested to him that I had not given that subject a great deal of consideration, but that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who has charge of the bill, is especially qualified to speak with reference to that.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator—because he has better knowledge, I am sure, on these questions than I have——

Mr. JONES. Not with reference to that; I doubt it.

Mr. KENYON. But the Senator has with reference to the general subject, because he comes from a State where, perhaps, it has required more study, though the question is one which is important to my State also. But does not section 6 practically amount to a perpetual franchise?

Mr. JONES. I think it does. I stated that yesterday. I discussed that proposition just a little. I think it does.

Mr. KENYON. The contracts that would be made might extend over such a period of time that the Government never would recapture the property, as provided in section 6.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I think that even if the Government should recapture, the Government would have to carry out those contracts.

Mr. KENYON. That might embrace trolley lines, the electric lighting of towns, and so on.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. KENYON. And the Senator does not believe that the Government ever would do it, does he?

Mr. JONES. Well, I doubt it.

Mr. KENYON. Take the Keokuk Dam. The amount of money that it would cost to recapture that property would be up in the millions—perhaps $20,000,000.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Keokuk Dam has a perpetual charter.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Keokuk Dam has a perpetual charter; but assuming that the Keokuk Dam, or some similar dam, might be constructed under this bill, it might just as well be a perpetual charter, might it not?

Mr. JONES. I stated yesterday, and I will state now, to indicate my position, that I think it ought to be. I do not think we ought to put any limit in here at all, for this reason: We have in practically every State of the Union a public-service commission that will see to it that the charges are reasonable and just, as nearly as any administrative officer can see to it, and that the service is efficient. If that be true, I do not see any object to be gained by changing the ownership or limiting the time. If the rates are just and reasonable for 50 years, if they are just and reasonable for 100 years, if they are just and reasonable for 1,000 years, why should any change be made or what advantage can be gained by it? Then, too, I think, as the Senator from California suggested the other day, that it is very important, especially in irrigation matters, that the right shall be perpetual. A man who gets a water right for his land does not get a water right for 10 years or for 25 years. He does not want a water right for any limited time. He wants it forever, because whenever the water stops all the value goes out of his farm, and his improvements are wasted, and all that sort of thing.

So, in the interest of permanency and stability and prosperity, I should prefer to see no limit at all where we have these public-service commissions. I would not be in favor of this unlimited grant if they were permitted to charge whatever they saw fit to charge, as they used to be permitted to do; but now that we have our regulative commissions, I can see nothing to be gained by having a limited period.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad the Senator is so frank about that, as he is about everything else, and admits that this bill practically gives a perpetual franchise.

Mr. JONES. I think it does.

Mr. SHIELDS and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not agree that this bill gives any perpetual franchise.

Mr. JONES. The Senator understood me to say "practically."

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that the Government at any time after 50 years can give notice and by proper proceedings take over the plant. I shall discuss that question and the proper construction of the section in regard to it when we reach the amendment offered in regard to it. I do not wish to do so now, while we have under consideration the amendment of the Senator from Montana in regard to entirely a different matter.

Mr. JONES. I do not think there is any difference between the Senator and myself. The terms of the bill, of course, make it a fixed term; but practically, as the Senator says, I think it is a perpetual grant.

Mr. KENYON. The bill prescribes a fixed way of recapture which can not practically be carried out.

Mr. JONES. I would not say that it can not be carried out, but it probably will not be carried out.

Mr. CLAPP. It makes the grantee subject to the laws of the State.

Mr. JONES. Absolutely.

Mr. CLAPP. And that is one of the conditions of the grant. Under section 8, the grantee forfeits the rights if it violates the conditions; so that it can only be said to be practically permanent so long as the grantee complies with those provisions that relate to Federal regulation and also relate to State regulation.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; that is true.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in closing the debate on my amendment—for I take it that all has been said that Senators desire to say with reference to it—I think I may, with entire propriety, recall to the minds of the Senators the exact purport of this amendment. It is to strike from line 22, on page 6, the words "based upon its value as land."

Mr. President, this amendment presents no question of the propriety of adopting a leasing system, with respect to any rights that are acquired under the act, rather than a system under which grants in perpetuity, alienations in fee, are made. The bill itself propounds the leasing system, both with respect to the right to place dams in navigable streams and with respect to occupying any portion of the public lands. The bill provides, not that the permittee shall have the right perpetually to occupy the stream, but that he shall have the right to occupy it for a limited period of 50 years. It provides that if public lands are to be occupied they shall not be occupied perpetually by the permittee, but only for the period of his permit. So that the amendment, as I suggest, does not present the question of the wisdom of that system as a whole at all. Furthermore, it does not at all present the question as to whether, with respect to the public lands that are to be occupied, if any shall be occupied, any charge is to be made or is not to be made; for the bill contemplates that a charge is to be made for this right. The amendment simply presents the question of the principle upon which the charge is to be made in the case of public lands occupied for the limited period of the franchise.

My esteemed friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who introduced the discussion of the matter on the part of those opposed to the amendment, found opportunity to hang upon this discussion the presentation of his views concerning the wisdom of the leasing system, and we listened to his well-known views with respect to that. It is in a way a digression, Mr. President. The Senator from Colorado insists that if any permission is to be given to occupy the public lands at all, that permission should not be given for a limited period, but that the lands should be conveyed away. The Senator's view is that we ought to get rid of the public lands without very much regard to how we get rid of them, or to whom we get rid of them, or upon what terms we get rid of them, so that they will pass into private ownership and become subject to taxation by the States. He urges that view very often.

In that connection the Senator from Colorado stated that the hopes which some of us entertain that development would take place under this bill, or something like it, might be judged by the fact that a year and a half ago we passed a bill which contemplated the leasing of the coal lands in Alaska; and he advised the Senate, as he did on a previous occasion, that that hope was doomed to disappointment, because after the lapse of a year and a half no one had ever come forward to take a lease upon the coal lands of Alaska.

Mr. President, the question is so important in many phases that I called up the Commissioner of the General Land Office to get accurate information upon that subject. The Senator from Colorado has stated the facts exactly. No one has ever come forward; no leases have been made. But no leases have been made, Mr. President, because no leases have ever been offered. The necessary surveys have not yet been made so as to afford an opportunity to invite people who might lease.

I send to the desk the letter of the commissioner, and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, February 23, 1916.

Hon. T. J. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your recent inquiry by telephone with respect to the matter of leases on the Alaska coal lands, under the Alaska coal-leasing act of October 20, 1914, I beg to advise that, as you recall, the act in question requires that the Secretary of the Interior shall cause said lands to be surveyed and laid out in leasing blocks; said act also authorizes the President to set aside certain areas as a reserve for Government use. Under the circumstances, therefore, the first thing to do under this act was to get the land surveyed. Consequently, necessary surveying parties went into each of the three principal coal fields, namely, Bering River, Matanuska, and Nenana, as early as weather conditions would permit last spring. The land surveyors were accompanied by topographic surveyors; and in two fields, the Matanuska and Bering River, they were accompanied by coal-mining engineers. The field work was all completed during the last summer season. The preparation of the necessary plats and field notes is now going on at Juneau as rapidly as possible, and we expect to have all of them in hand here within a few weeks.

In the meantime the two coal-mining engineers were given advance photographic copies of topographic sheets and survey plats, so that they could go ahead with the work of making up their reports and laying out the blocks of land for leasing purposes. These two men are here at present, and have their reports practically ready to present to the Secretary of the Interior.

In the meantime, also during the past summer, much attention was given by the different bureaus of this department to the matter of formulating satisfactory coal leases and regulations, all of which has been done, so that immediately the field notes are received here from Juneau the department will be in a position promptly to issue coal regulations and information for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska.

You will recall that section 10 of the coal-leasing act provides for free-use permits on small tracts for local consumption. Regulations and forms under this section were issued shortly after the act was passed, and I inclose herewith a copy. Advices have reached this office of operations being conducted under such permits in 10 cases.

From the above you will note that, so far as the larger leasing operations are concerned, the department has not up to date been in a position to grant a lease on any Alaska coal lands or to consider any application, though there have been numerous requests for information in this connection.

Yours, very truly,
CLAY TALLMAN.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, to get back to the amendment before us for consideration, the bill provides that the amount of the charges which the Secretary of War shall exact on account of the use or occupancy of any public lands that may be required in connection with any of these projects shall be determined by him upon the basis of the value of the land to be occupied. In other words, he is to ascertain what the value of the raw land is. That is to be the capital, and on that capital the Government is to receive, as I assume, a reasonable interest return. I suppose probably 5 per cent will be regarded as reasonable. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who seems to have originated this part of the bill, or at least it conforms to his idea, introduced at the last session a bill which contemplated determining in that way the price to be paid.

The amendment contemplates striking that out and leaving it entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of War to require the payment of such annual charges or other amount as to him may seem wise. Thus, Mr. President, he will have an opportunity to provide in the permit, if he sees fit to do so, that an annual payment shall be made of so much per horsepower developed or developed and used; in other words, to base the charges upon the amount of power which is produced in connection with the lands that are to be used.

It is between these two plans that the Senate is required to make choice in the amendment which has been proposed by me.

It is perfectly clear that those who are opposing the amendment offered by me are opposing it because they fear that by it an undue burden will be put upon the power companies seeking these privileges; that is to say, that they will be too heavily burdened, and that the imposition of that burden upon them will arrest the development of these water-power projects, the speedy utilization of which is the earnest desire of all those, including myself, who hope to see this legislation enacted.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is quite frank about the matter. He does not want any charge at all to be exacted for the use of these lands. He would give the power company seeking this permit the use and occupancy of all the public lands it needs without any charge at all; and if a charge is going to be made, he is perfectly frank to say—and I admire and respect him for it—that he wants to tie down the Secretary of War as far as he can, so that the charge shall not be anything of any considerable consequence.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] presents this matter in an exceedingly persuasive way, and the argument made by him is entitled to most respectful consideration. He says:

> If these lands were owned by a private individual and the power company desired to make use of those lands, it could go into court, condemn those lands, pay the actual value of the lands, and occupy them.

He further says:

> The Government owns these lands in exactly the same way as a private proprietor owns the lands, and it should, therefore, be subject to exactly the same rules—

And that the public lands should be taken by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in exactly the same way and upon exactly the same terms as the lands of private owners.

Mr. President, that is a theory of the law which is now presented for the consideration of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is advanced by certain gentlemen whose views are entitled to very great respect in the State of Colorado that the State has the inherent power to exercise the right of eminent domain over all lands within its borders, even the lands belonging to the United States—the public lands—and that it can invest any corporation which it creates with that sovereign power to go out and take these public lands; in other words, that the State may say to any power company: "Go out on the public domain and occupy whatever power site you can find, and we will grant you the right to that site, paying to the United States only the actual value of it."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH. Gladly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand that there is now pending a case involving that very question?

Mr. WALSH. I had a copy of the brief. It was presented to the United States District Court for the District of Colorado. My understanding is that it was denied, and that an appeal has been taken, and the case is now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator know whether or not it has been heard?

Mr. WALSH. No; I am sure it has not.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then there is not any probability of its being decided very soon?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. SHIELDS. Instead of putting in the bill a provision of the kind contained in it—that the Secretary of War may fix the charge upon the land, based upon its value as land, taking into consideration the benefits to the permittee as well as the benefits conferred upon navigation—if a provision were substituted authorizing the corporations of the States and the individuals making application under the provisions of this bill to condemn these public lands in a proceeding in eminent domain, would that relieve the objection of the Senator?

Mr. WALSH. Why, certainly not. I should say not. In the first place, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the Congress of the United States has never yet given permission to sue the United States in a condemnation proceeding.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Senator is.

Mr. SHIELDS. But what I ask is, Would the Senator offer any objection to the substitution, now in this bill, of permission of Congress for these companies to condemn the land under the right of eminent domain?

Mr. WALSH. I should; yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. The reason why I asked the question was that I thought the Senator concurred in the view expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; by no means. I was going to say that it is a very persuasive kind of an argument to make, but it is lacking in soundness. It is lacking in soundness, for this reason: Although the Government of the United States holds the title to these lands in a proprietary and not in a governmental sense, yet it does not handle the lands as a private owner handles his lands. I will say to the Senator that never in the history of our country has the Government of the United States awarded to the States the right to bring it into any court for the purpose of condemning to public uses any lands belonging to the United States. When we consider that that policy has been pursued since 1789 down to the present time—now 127 years—we may well believe that there is some good, sound reason why that should not have been done, or it would have been done a long time ago. The reason for it is that when the corporation invested with the sovereign right of eminent domain seeks to take the property of a single individual we have the case of the sovereign people on the one side—all the people of the State—demanding that the property be put to public uses, and a single individual selfishly demanding that he hold it for his own individual, private purposes.

But in the case of the Government of the United States we have quite a different situation. The Government of the United States does not hold its land as a private proprietor for the purpose of making money out of it. The Government of the United States represents the people of this great Nation with reference to its public lands, and you have the people of a State on the one side and the great constituency of the people of the United States on the other side, the people of the State demanding that it be put to a certain public use and the Government of the United States saying, "We do not think it wise to put it to the public use upon the terms that you propose."

Therefore, Mr. President, it is not correct at all to say that because the private individual must give up his lands for a cash value the Government of the United States is obliged to give up its lands for a cash price or to exact an annual return that is equivalent to the interest upon the cash price, because it will say, "We have a great public purpose to subserve; we do not think it wise in the interests of all the people of this Nation that we should let this land go at this particular time for the amount of cash that it will bring in the market. If you desire to do it, however, upon the terms which we prescribe, you are quite welcome to it."

So, Mr. President, we insist that the public policy as addressed to this particular measure is that the charge should not be made on the question of the actual cash value of the property at that time, but upon other and broader considerations of public policy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The section of the bill under discussion, which provides that this land shall be valued or paid for according to its value as land, does not stop there at all. It goes further and says that—

> In fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

Now, I ask the Senator if, under the provision I have read requiring the Secretary of War to place the price upon all the lands according to their value as land and then authorizing him to place another price or another value according to the benefits conferred upon the grantee, he thinks it would be likely that a fair price or an exorbitant price, if you please, may be required under the provisions of this section?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the question the Senator addresses to me is a very pertinent one. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asked the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] yesterday substantially the same question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want the Senator to answer mine.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to do so. In other words, he asks whether the idea expressed in the language which I seek to strike out is not irreconcilable and inconsistent with the subsequent language. It will say to the Senator that it is my opinion that it is, and therefore I want to make it harmonious by taking out the other language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, I fear the Senator from Montana would like to amend the bill so that it would be utterly worthless after it is passed from the viewpoint of those who are in favor of it.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; not at all, Mr. President, because I am in favor of this bill, and I am as earnestly desirous of seeing it passed as is the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator upon this floor. Mr. President, I desire to have it understood now that I do not intend to be charged as being an opponent of this bill if I am not willing to have it go through without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," and that is the thing that is put up to us.

The Senator from Alabama awhile ago interrogated the Senator from Washington concerning the great power site at Priest Rapids. Mr. President, that is a wonderful resource. It is a magnificent power site. I presume, possibly with the exception of Niagara, there is not one like it in the United States. That is a great river. It comes clear up into my State; its headwaters traverse it for many, many miles. I want to see it opened to navigation. I want to see that great power developed. But that does not demonstrate that this is a good bill, either in its general aspects or in its details, and I shall continue my humble efforts, in my humble way, to get the bill to conform, if I can, to my ideas as to what a water-power bill should be.

We are constantly told, Mr. President, that this bill is necessary because water-power development has been arrested and this will start it on the way. I have no doubt it will; I am quite sure it will. But, Mr. President, it was said that the old bill was unworkable, and, therefore, we must take this bill. I do not concede that we are confronted with any such alternative at all.

It is suggested that no development will take place unless this bill goes through just exactly as it came from the Committee on Commerce, or that in some way or other development will be arrested if the amendment now proposed by me shall be adopted.

Mr. President, upon what basis is any such claim as that asserted, and how can it be maintained? Why were not plants constructed under the act of 1910? It is perfectly obvious why they were not constructed. It was not because the act of 1910 provided that the privilege should be granted for 50 years only. This bill adopts that view. It was not because the act of 1910 provided that a charge should be made for the privilege which it extended. This amendment here provides for the imposition of a charge. It was simply and plainly, Mr. President, because the Secretary of War was not authorized to grant a permit at all under the act of 1910 until first a special act was put through Congress, and it has been found impossible since that time to put an act through Congress because of the contending views of the extremists, the one claiming everything for the power sites and the other side imposing and insisting upon imposing impossible terms. I hope that we shall get into a frame of mind where we can get away from both of them and pursue some medium course which will at once protect the rights of the people and offer reasonable inducements to the investment of capital.

Mr. President, what obstacle will this amendment be in the way of the development of these powers?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to put to the Senator from Montana the question that I asked a day or two ago of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], for I confess that there are in this part of the bill provisions which seem to me to be contradictory. Quoting from the bill I read:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War—

That seems to me to be a direct command to the Secretary of War that the charges shall be based upon the value of the site as land. But I find immediately afterwards this language:

> and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

Is it not true that the clause I have just read is entirely inconsistent with fixing the charge upon the basis of the value of the property as land? That is to say, it directs the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of the improvement to the public for the purposes of navigation, and I assume that in that way the charge might be not only reduced below the point of the value of the property as land but it might create a credit to the person to whom the permit is granted.

Then the Secretary of War must also take into account in fixing the charge the business of the grantee. I assume that means that if it is likely the business will be very profitable the charge shall be great; if it is likely that the business will be unprofitable or little profitable, then the charge shall be low. That idea is emphasized by the next provision:

In fixing such conditions, or any of them, the Secretary of War shall also take into consideration the probable cost to such grantee of construction and maintenance and operation, and the probable consumers' rate required to produce a reasonable return upon the investment required of such grantee.

If that means anything, it means that the charge shall be graduated according to the probable outcome of the enterprise.

I am unable to see why the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Alabama resist so strenuously the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, when the bill itself provides that all these broader considerations must enter into the final judgment of the Secretary of War with regard to the charge to be made by the occupation of the land.

I suggest that to the Senator from Montana, for I have been unable to see the operation of these latter clauses if the sponsors of the bill intend that the charge shall be based entirely on the value of the property as land.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I see no——

Mr. SHIELDS. May I ask a question?

Mr. WALSH. The question was addressed to me. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee in a moment.

Mr. President, I can see no possible escape from the conclusion which is obvious from the remarks of the Senator from Iowa. The two present two directly divergent and antagonistic theories upon which to estimate the annual charge. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, if I understand him correctly, what his objection is to the words "based upon land" when he thinks the subsequent provision means the same thing?

Mr. CUMMINS. I must answer the Senator from Tennessee in this way: I think, myself, the interpretation of the statute would be precisely the same whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is adopted or not. I think the bill itself——

Mr. SHIELDS. Then the Senator can see no reason for the Senator from Montana insisting on his amendment, or no further reason?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am unable to see its great materiality, because I believe that the bill does provide for other bases of fixing charges, just as the Senator from Montana would have it. But I shall nevertheless vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, because I do not believe in having inconsistencies or repugnancies in a bill.

Now, I ask the Senator from Tennessee: Suppose that a given site were before the Secretary of War and he should find that the value of the site as land was $500, but he should also find that the benefits accruing to the people of the country from the improvement in navigation was $1,000, what would the Senator from Tennessee do under those circumstances if he were Secretary of War?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Tennessee would charge the company for the value of the land for all the purposes for which it is valuable, and such are the provisions of this bill. It is subject to no other construction in my opinion. I am wholly unable to comprehend how it can be construed in any other way.

This provision that the charges shall be based on the value of the land as land prevents a broader construction which would enable the Secretary of War to charge for the water flowing in the stream and the power created by the improvement, in which the United States has no interest and can not justly or constitutionally charge for.

Mr. CUMMINS. But——

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not through. I should like to present an authority on this question to the Senate right at this time, if I may have the indulgence of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is the case of the United States against Chandler-Dunbar Co., which is so often cited to sustain the power of the United States to charge for water power. I may say here that it only applies to the facts of that case. The United States had built a dam and had purchased the banks and bed of the stream under a condemnation proceeding, and was therefore the riparian proprietor, and for those reasons had the right to charge for the excess power produced. In that case the Chandler-Dunbar Co. claimed various items as incidental damages to the remainder of this land. In the court below they were allowed them to the extent of some $650,000. The Supreme Court disallowed nearly all of them. I wish the Senators in listening to this opinion to keep in mind that the position of the United States in that case was directly the reverse of what it will be in a case under this bill. In that case here the Chandler-Dunbar Co. owned the land and the United States was seeking to condemn it. Under the provisions of this bill the land to be acquired belongs to the United States and the power company will seek, in substance, to acquire it. The rule that applies in favor of the United States when it condemns land ought to apply to it when a public-utility corporation proposes to acquire it for a public use.

Mr. CUMMINS. Might I make a suggestion there so that the Senator may consider it as he goes on with the case?

Mr. SHIELDS. After I read the case I will yield to the Senator.

Coming now to the award for the upland taken: The court below awarded to the Chandler-Dunbar Co. on this account—

(a) For the narrow strip of upland bordering on the river, having an area of something more than 8 acres, excluding the small parcels described in the pleadings and judgment as claims 95 and 96, $65,000, less 7 per cent of that sum on account of Portage Street, which the court later found belonged to the United States and not to that company, $60,450.

(b) For the small parcels covered by claims 95 and 96, $25,000.

(c) For a half interest in lot on bridge property, $338.

These awards include certain sums for special values. The value of the upland strip, fixed at $60,450, was arrived at in this manner:

(a) For its value, including railroad side tracks, buildings, and cable terminal, including also its use, "wholly disconnected with power development or public improvement, that is to say, for all general purposes, like residences or hotels, factory sites, disconnected with water power, etc., $20,000."

(b) For use as factory site in connection with the development of 6,500 horsepower, either as a single site or for several factories to use the surplus of 6,500 horsepower not now used in the city, an additional value of $20,000.

(c) For use for canal and lock purposes, an additional value of $25,000.

The small parcels constituting claims 95 and 96 were valued at $25,000.

These two parcels seem to have been connected by a costly fill. They fronted upon deep water above the head of the rapids. They had therefore a special value for wharves, docks, etc., and had been so used. The gross sum awarded included the following elements:

(a) For general wharfage, dock, and warehouse purposes, disconnected with development of power in the rapids, $10,000.

(b) For its special value for canal and lock purposes an additional sum of $10,000.

(c) In connection with the canal along the rapids, if used as a part of the development of 4,500 (6,500) horsepower, an additional value of $5,000.

The United States excepted to the additional value allowed in consequence of the availability of these parcels in connection with the water power supposed to be the property of the Chandler-Dunbar Co. and supposed to have been taken by the Government in this case. It also excepted to so much of the awards as constituted an additional value by reason of availability for lock and canal purposes.

These exceptions, so far as they complain of the additional value to be attached to these parcels for use as factory sites in connection with the development of horsepower by the Chandler-Dunbar Co., must be sustained. These "additional" values were based upon the erroneous hypothesis that that company had a private-property interest in the water power of the river, not possibly needed now or in the future for purposes of navigation, and that that excess or surplus water was capable, by some extension of their works already in the river, of producing 6,500 horsepower.

Having decided that the Chandler-Dunbar Co. as riparian owners had no such vested property right in the water power inherent in the falls and rapids of the river and no right to place in the river the works essential to any practical use of the flow of the river, the Government can not be justly required to pay for an element of value which did not inhere in these parcels as upland. The Government had dominion over the water power of the rapids and falls and can not be required to pay any hypothetical additional value to a riparian owner who had no right to appropriate the current to his own commercial use. These additional values represent, therefore, no actual loss and there would be no justice in paying for a loss suffered by no one in fact. "The requirement of the fifth amendment is satisfied when the owner is paid for what is taken from him. The question is what has the owner lost, and not what has the taker gained." (Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Boston, 217 U. S., 189, 194, 195.)

Neither can consideration be given to probable advancement in the value of such riparian property by reason of the works to be constructed in the river by the Government or the use to which the flow of the stream might be directed by the Government. The value should be fixed as of the date of the proceedings and with reference to the loss the owner sustains, considering the property in its condition and situation at the time it is taken and not as enhanced by the purpose for which it was taken. (Kerr v. Park Commissioners, 117 U. S., 379, 387; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282, 304, 305.)

The exception taken to the inclusion as an element of value of the availability of these parcels of land for lock and canal purposes must be overruled. That this land had a prospective value for the purpose of constructing a canal and lock parallel with those in use had passed beyond the region of the purely conjectural or speculative. That one or more additional parallel canals and locks would be needed to meet the increasing demands of lake traffic was an immediate probability. This land was the only land available for the purpose. It included all the land between the canals in use and the bank of the river. Although it is not proper to estimate land condemned for public purposes by the public necessities or its worth to the public for such purpose, it is proper to consider the fact that the property is so situated that it will probably be desired and available for such a purpose. (Lewis on Eminent Domain, 707. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S., 403, 408; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga., 30; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn., 510; Sargent v. Merrimac, 196, Mass., 171.) Boom Co. v. Patterson was this: A boom company sought to condemn three small islands in the Mississippi River so situated with reference to each other and the river bank as to be peculiarly adapted to form a boom a mile in length. The question in the case was whether their adaptability for that purpose gave the property a special value which might be considered. This court held that the adaptability of the land for the purposes of a boom was an element which should be considered in estimating the value of the lands condemned. The court said, touching the rule for estimating damages in such cases:

"So many and varied are the circumstances to be taken into account in determining the value of property condemned for public purposes that it is perhaps impossible to formulate a rule to govern its appraisement in all cases. Exceptional circumstances will modify the most carefully guarded rule, but, as a general thing, we should say that the compensation to the owner is to be estimated by reference to the uses for which the property is suitable, having regard to the existing business or wants of the community or such as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future."

In Shoemaker against United States, supra, lands were condemned for park purposes. In the court below the commissioners were instructed to estimate each piece of land at its market value, and that "the market value of the land includes its value for any use to which it may be put, and all the uses to which it is adapted, and not merely the condition in which it is at the present time, and the use to which it is now applied by the owner; * * * that if, by reason of its location, its surroundings, its natural advantages, its artificial improvement, or its intrinsic character, it is peculiarly adapted to some particular use—e. g., to the use of a public park—all the circumstances which make up this adaptability may be shown, and the fact of such adaptation may be taken into consideration in estimating the compensation." The court approved this instruction.

Now, those claims were disallowed as being incident to the land of the riparian proprietor. The position that is taken by the committee and by a good many others in the Senate is that the United States as a proprietor of lands lying along these navigable rivers can not claim anything for their land on account of such values as I have read and that were disallowed in that case, but there are certain values which can be considered in condemning lands of this character, and this provision provides for the allowance of them. In other words, whatever value the property has by its situation on the rivers should be considered by the Secretary of War and charged for, or, to state it in other words, the charge should be on the same basis as the value is fixed in an ordinary condemnation proceeding. That, it seems to me, would be just between the United States and the company proposing to make the development, and certainly the United States ought not to want to invoke a harsher rule. The object of taking the land is one for the public benefit, for a public-utility purpose. In fact, it ought to be donated when it is for a public use.

Now, I wish to read further from this case. I am not going to read it all, though it would be very instructive if I did. On page 80, in referring to another position insisted upon by the Chandler-Dunbar Co., that it was entitled to recover for the "strategic value," the court said:

The "strategic value" for which $15,000 has been allowed is altogether speculative. It is based not upon the actual market value for all reasonable uses and demands but the possible worth of the property to the Government.

A "strategic value" might be realized by a price fixed by the necessities of one person buying from another, free to sell or refuse, as the price suited. But in a condemnation proceeding the value of the property to the Government for its particular use is not a criterion. The owner must be compensated for what is taken from him, but that is done when he is paid its fair market value for all available uses and purposes. (Lewis Eminent Domain, 3d ed., 706; Maulton v. Newburyport Water Co., 137 Mass., 163, 167; United States v. Seufert Bros. Co., 78 Fed. Rep., 520; Alloway v. Nashville, 88 Tenn., 510, 514; United States v. Honolulu Co., 122 Fed. Rep., 581.)

The exception must be sustained.

Mr. President, the provision of the bill in question is somewhat in the nature of a condemnation proceeding. The power company is authorized to occupy it for a public use. The object of the provision proposed to be stricken out is to lay down the rule by which the Secretary of War shall be governed in fixing the charges which the power company shall pay. The United States owns the land, but has no interest in the water. It can charge for the former but not the latter. The Government should not charge a public-utility company for a thing it does not own. The object in placing the words in question in the bill is to make it emphatic that there shall be no charge for the water of the stream or the power produced by it. It is to exclude the inclusion of any value except that of the land. The charge can include every element of value which inheres in the land, but for nothing more.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the position that is now taken by the Senator from Tennessee is perfectly understandable.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope so.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the decision of the Supreme Court in the case from which he read is not difficult to understand; but there is a vast difference between the rule of law applied in the Dunbar case and the rule which is prescribed for the Secretary of War in the bill before us.

The Dunbar case was decided upon the general rules of law relating to the ascertainment of value, rules that are fairly well known; but the Secretary of War is required in the measure that we are now considering to be guided by certain other rules, not rules of the general law at all. It so happens, in my view of it, that the things the bill requires the Secretary of War to consider are the very things that were excluded in the Dunbar case. The rules which the Secretary of War is required to follow are a complete reversal of the general rules of the law respecting the ascertainment of value. I shall at a later time express my opinion with regard to the question of charging a grantee in order to secure a revenue for the General Government, but I am now interested only in the consistency of this part of the bill. It is provided in the bill that the Secretary of War must take into account the public benefits accruing from the use and occupation of the land to navigation. Would such benefits be taken into account in an ordinary condemnation suit? The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] very well knows that they would not be.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. If we were to authorize simply a condemnation suit, in which the lands were to be valued in the way provided in the law, does the Senator from Tennessee think that, in order to reduce the value of the land that was to be taken from the Government, the individual could introduce evidence showing that the improvement would be of vast use to the country at large? I am sure he would not so contend. That is one of the things not precisely parallel, but generally parallel, with the items that were excluded by the Supreme Court in the ascertainment of value in the Dunbar case.

Again, the Secretary of War must take into account the business of the grantee. That means what the property is worth to the grantee for the especial purpose for which he desires to use it. He must take into account the probable profits of the grantee, the extent of the business, and from those sources of information ascertain what the grantee can fairly afford to pay to the Government for the land which is sought to be taken.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator yield to me for a correction?

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait until I close this sentence. That inquiry is prohibited under the Dunbar case and under the general law. A railroad in condemning the land of a private citizen would not be subject to testimony offered by the citizen that the railroad itself was very likely to be extremely profitable, and that it could therefore afford to pay a large amount for the land.

Again, in the last clause of the bill the court—which is the Secretary of War—is required to take into account how much money the entire improvement is to cost and how much it will probably cost to maintain it and, I assume, under the laws of competition, what the probable rate to be paid by consumers will be, all for the purpose of ascertaining how much this land is worth to the particular person or corporation which is to be permitted to occupy it.

If the Senator from Tennessee desires to limit the payment for public land to a value that would be ascertained in an ordinary condemnation proceeding, it will be necessary for him to very materially change the form of his bill. I am conscious, however, that I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I only wanted to make it clear, so far as I can read the bill, that the Senator from Tennessee must grant the amendment of the Senator from Montana in order that the whole provision shall be consistent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I understood the question addressed to the Senator from Tennessee by the Senator from Iowa to be as to whether there is not an irreconcilable inconsistency between the language to which my amendment is addressed and the remainder of the provisions of the bill on that subject. No question was raised, as I understand, by the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa as to what should be the proper elements entering into the compensation to be rendered, but it was as to whether there is not an inconsistency in the language of the bill.

Mr. President, my idea about the matter is that if the language to which my amendment is addressed is excised from the bill it will present exactly the principle which I desire to see incorporated in that feature of the bill. If the idea represented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is to find expression in the bill, then all of the subsequent language pointed out by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] ought to be taken out. The two can not stand together.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I will yield for a question, though I had hoped that I should have concluded before this time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire the Senator to yield merely for a statement. I understood the interrogatory of the Senator from Iowa to be, whether or not the provision in question was inconsistent; and I answered distinctly that it was not, but that it was entirely consistent, and that the words which the Senator from Montana moves to strike out were inserted in order to make the subsequent words clearer and more explicit and to repel the idea of charging for the water power, which I understand to be the desire of the Senator from Montana. The United States has no power to tax the business and property of the power companies. The States have such power, and they should and will tax them. All charges of this kind should go into the treasuries of the States where they and their property are domiciled and situated.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, we need not proceed further on that line, only I understood the Senator from Tennessee to read from the opinion in the Dunbar case, to invite our attention to the rules there laid down for the purpose of determining the value of property in condemnation proceedings.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did that in order to show the necessity for the retention of the words which the Senator from Montana moves to strike out.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but nothing will be found therein which will justify taking into consideration, in determining the amount that is to be paid, the benefit which will accrue to the Government by virtue of it nor any of the features referred to in the provisions of the bill subsequent to the language which I move to strike out, which is found on pages 6 and 7. That language presents an entirely different basis for the estimation of the charge, and, as I think, the proper basis. For instance, in determining the charge, the Secretary of War is directed to take into consideration "the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee."

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] the other day told us about a great work down in his State. In order to carry on that work, in order to get the permit at all, the permittee was obliged to make a very large expenditure of money—running into the millions of dollars almost, as I now recollect—not for his own good at all, not to assist him in the development of power, but in aid of navigation. So, Mr. President, when the permittee is required to make such heavy expenditures as that for the interest of the general public, very likely the charges that would be exacted of him by the Secretary of War would be very meager, if the Secretary of War made any charge at all; but we may very readily conceive that a permit of this character would be granted for the privilege of putting in a dam at some place where it would not be necessary to make improvements of that character at all, nor would a dollar have to be expended by the permittee that would not have direct reference to his own business and the generation of power. Under the language of the bill the Secretary of War, in fixing the charges, would take into consideration that the permittee was not obliged to expend a dollar for the public benefit, and that the whole thing was going to make the business of the permittee exceedingly profitable. In such a case the Secretary of War would put his charges up high. I think that would be the proper thing to do.

Again, Mr. President, on the next page it is provided that "in fixing such conditions, or any of them, the Secretary of War shall also take into consideration the probable cost to such grantee of construction and maintenance." If the permittee is obliged to put an enormous amount of money into the work with the chances of a small return, the charges which he is required to pay will be small. If, on the contrary, the work requires an inconsiderable investment, comparatively speaking, and yet the returns promise to be very great indeed, the Secretary of War will take that into consideration.

But moreover, Mr. President, the Secretary of War is required to take into consideration "the probable consumers'" rate required to produce a reasonable return upon the investment required of such grantee. The Secretary of War will ask the permittee, "How much do you intend to charge for power?" Let us take, for instance, one of the great transcontinental railroads piercing the Sierra Nevadas—take the Union Pacific. Some one may want to get an opportunity to put in a dam in the Sacramento River for the purpose of developing power for the Union Pacific Railroad. The Secretary of War will ask, "How much are you going to charge the Union Pacific for this power?" The permittee will say, "I am going to charge $30 a horsepower; they have agreed to pay that for it." The Secretary of War will say, "Oh, well, you will be making a nice profit on that and you can afford to contribute something to the general revenues; you can afford to pay a dollar a horsepower, then, for that. You will not have to spend a dollar on your work for the improvement of navigation, as they had to do down in Alabama. We caused those people down there to expend a million dollars for the public benefit in order that they might enjoy their privilege. We will have to exact of you some kind of return for this privilege which you get."

Furthermore, Mr. President, the Secretary of War might easily provide a scale and say, "If your charge is going to be so much per horsepower, the royalty you will have to pay will be 25 cents a horsepower. If you charge $5 per horsepower, the royalty will be 50 cents per horsepower." Thus the Secretary of War can graduate the charges that he makes by the charges that the company is going to make to the consumer. Those are proper matters to be taken into consideration by the Secretary in fixing the charges, and so the bill provides.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], however, says he will not stand for that at all, and that the bill is intended to deny to the Secretary of War any discretion of that kind whatever. The Senator says it denies to him that discretion by virtue of the language to which this amendment is addressed. The Senator from Washington—and I had hoped that he might at least do me the honor to listen to this part of my rambling address—asks, with perfect frankness, "what is the use of making a charge?" He says, "Whatever charge is made must go upon the cost of the thing; that the consumer must pay it"; and he asks what is the difference, even though the privilege is obtained for nothing, because in all the States the rates will be regulated by public-service commissions, and nothing more can be exacted than a reasonable return upon the money invested.

Why, Mr. President, even if that were true, even if the thing worked out exactly, even though it were done accurately, there is no sort of obligation that the power company that gets this permit shall go into the public-utility business nor itself become a public utility. A dam may be constructed by a private individual for private purposes. His charges will not be subject to public regulation in any way whatever. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who wants this bill passed without a single amendment——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I have not said that, and the Senator from Montana has no right to assume that that is my position.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if that is not the attitude of the Senator, I gladly withdraw the remark. He spoke, I thought, with some evidence——

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee in charge of the bill have said all the time that they are willing to accept any amendment that will improve the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Alabama seemed to feel that I was guilty of obstructive tactics, or something of that kind, in offering the amendments which I have prepared. The Senator from Alabama is exceedingly hopeful—and I sincerely trust that his hope may be realized—that under this bill some great corporation will go into his State and invest perhaps as much as $10,000,000 in the development of a great power plant and nitrate works. I hope they will. We entertain that kind of a hope out in Montana as well. We trust that when the power companies and nitrate companies come to look over the field they will think our opportunities are a little better than they are down in Alabama; but, whether they locate in Alabama or in Montana, they will not be subject to public regulation in any way. A corporation takes out a permit and puts up nitrate works. How is that institution subject to regulation any more than a cotton factory, any more than the cotton mills in the State of my friend, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]? It is not subject to regulation at all; so that argument will not do. The great corporation engaged in that work will, of course, come before the Secretary of War and lay before him all its plans, and he will carefully examine into what prospects it has, what outlook there is for a market, what probable profits there will be in the business; and he ought to graduate his charges accordingly.

Mr. President, it is by no means true that no development has occurred under the act of 1910 because that act provided for a charge for the privilege which it accorded. As I said a while ago that act did not operate, because a permit could not be granted except in each individual case a special act of Congress were passed authorizing the construction of the dam. That the imposition of the charge was not what made the act inoperative is demonstrated beyond question or controversy by the fact that charges have been made under the administration of the forest-reserve law since 1900 without any trouble in development at all under that law. Since 1909, when the wholesale cancellation of permits for the construction of power sites within forest reserves was made, only about 15,000 horsepower has been developed. A permit was taken out the other day, even under the existing conditions, for a power plant in the State of Montana, the capacity of which was 1,000 horsepower. Small enterprises here and small enterprises there have been developed under permits granted since 1909; but probably those general cancellations put an end to such development under existing law upon the forest reserves. Up to that time, Mr. President, it was generally believed that those permits would not be canceled; that they would go on indefinitely, or, at least, that they would not be canceled except upon the most earnest and sincere consideration and upon a perfectly good cause, and while they were operative charges were made just exactly the same, but development was not interrupted in the least degree. Up to 1909 there was 325,150 horsepower developed upon the public domain, although a charge was made in every single instance. The charge, it is true, was trifling. Even the Secretary of the Interior, who is the man so much to be dreaded in this matter, never imposed a charge during that time that seemed to afford any obstacle whatever to the development.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have no doubt the Senator's statement is correct about the quantity of power that has been developed.

Mr. WALSH. I have the figures right here.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have relied on the correctness of the statement of the Secretary of War that only 140,000 horsepower had been developed in all that time and upon the statement of the Secretary of the Interior in the circular letter which was read by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in which he said that under the act of 1910 there had been no development; that the matter was at a standstill; and unless more liberal legislation were enacted it would continue to be at a standstill and all these great resources would run to waste and the people be deprived of the benefit of cheap power for manufacturing purposes and the cheap products that follow cheap power.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator is proceeding upon an entirely erroneous assumption. I was not talking about the development under the act of 1910; I was talking about development on forest reserves under the authority given to the Secretary of Agriculture to grant leases upon the forest reserves.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he was talking about navigable streams that come within the provisions of this bill. This bill only applies to navigable streams. The act of 1910 only applied to them. I am not informed as to the water power on the forest reserves.

Mr. WALSH. So that the Senator may understand the argument I make, I insist that the imposition of a charge, either for the lands themselves or for the privilege, will be no obstacle whatever to development, because for nine years that charge was made in all the permits granted for the institution and installation of power plants upon forest reserves; and, notwithstanding that charge was made, during that time——

Mr. SHIELDS. What amount of development took place during all these 15 years?

Mr. WALSH. No; the development commenced about 1900 and it ceased in 1909 because of the wholesale cancellations at that time.

Mr. SHIELDS. By Secretary Garfield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. Forty in one day?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. Projects upon which millions of dollars had been expended?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I shall not now enter into a debate as to the wisdom or the unwisdom, the justice or the injustice, of that act.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am simply speaking of the facts.

Mr. WALSH. I am speaking of the fact that water-power development on the forest reserves was arrested.

Mr. SHIELDS. For how long?

Mr. WALSH. Until the present day.

Mr. SHIELDS. Up to 1909 there was how much developed?

Mr. WALSH. There was 325,130 horsepower developed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Only 325,000 horsepower?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. Out of 60,000,000 horsepower. Does the Senator think that was much of a development?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator ought not to get confused about this matter. There is not 60,000,000 horsepower on the forest reserves.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is, according to the estimates, 60,000,000 horsepower in the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Oh yes; but only a very small amount, comparatively speaking, in forest reserves.

Mr. SHIELDS. How much is there in the forest reserves?

Mr. WALSH. I can not say, but whatever there is, 325,000 horsepower on the forest reserves is a great big development.

Mr. SHIELDS. There are several million horsepower in the forest reserves.

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there is about 42,000,000 horsepower in the Western States, and I will ask the Senator from Montana if the greater part of that is not in the forest reserves?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not, because there is 400,000 horsepower at Priest Pass, with possibly 1,200,000 more along the same river. I know there is 400,000 horsepower more at The Dalles, and I could easily refer to many other places. Take the Pend Oreille, about which I spoke here the other day, where the development amounts to 250,000 horsepower. That is not within a forest reserve.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have seen a statement of it, but I do not remember the precise amount. I know the horsepower on the forest reserves would run into the millions and that the development stated by the Senator was comparatively small and insignificant.

Mr. WALSH. Another great power site is the Big Horn, which is not in a forest reserve. But what is the difference? In that period there was 325,000 horsepower developed, with a charge attached to every one of them. What is the use of talking about a trifling charge of 10 cents a horsepower, or 25 cents a horsepower, or 50 cents a horsepower, or a dollar a horsepower, for that matter, being an obstacle of any consequence in the development of water power? We who live in the West know that it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to get the exact figures as to the amount of horsepower in the Western States, I refer the Senator to page 200 of the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands of the United States Senate, in which it is stated that in the Western States there is 44,049,000 horsepower, and if I had the time to refer to the testimony of a number of witnesses, who, as I remember, testified before the committee, I think I could verify the statement that the greater part of that is on forest reserves.

Mr. WALSH. I might say, Mr. President, that if the development upon forest reserves had not been arrested in 1909 by wholesale cancellations, but had been allowed to go on as it was going on up to that time, it would have been demonstrated by this time, so that it would not now be open to discussion at all, that the mere matter of a charge was no substantial obstacle to the development.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connnection I desire to say to the Senator that there has already been developed in the West, particularly in the Mountain States, more power than there is a market for. I take it for granted that the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. WALSH. I will not agree to it; on the contrary, I know that the opposite is true.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say, Mr. President, is that the testimony before the Public Lands Committee shows that in California, I think, the amount of power produced to-day exceeds that which is used or called for by nearly 35 per cent. There is more developed in the State of Utah than is being used; there is more developed in the State of Nevada than is being used; there is more developed in the State of Washington than is being used; and I might go further and say there is more developed in some of the other States than is being used. It may be, so far as Montana is concerned, that there is a greater demand for power than the amount of power developed to-day can supply; but that is not the rule in the Western States generally.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the idea the Senator has now advanced was presented by Mr. Merrill of the Forest Service in his testimony before the Public Lands Committee, and he elaborated the same idea before the Water Power Congress at Portland some time ago.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. But I am entirely unable to agree with Mr. Merrill's facts or with the conclusions he draws from them. On the contrary, Mr. President, I beg to say that the last great development in the State of Montana was at the Great Falls of the Missouri, where there was developed 90,000 horsepower. The president of the Montana Power Co. paid me a visit only two weeks ago, and told me that every pound of the power was now disposed of, and that they were proceeding to develop another new site in my State.

Why, Mr. President, the State of Washington is here asking the passage of this bill, or something like it, in order that it may develop the great power site at Priest Rapids, capable of producing 400,000 horsepower. Now, what is the use of talking about there being enough? Why, Mr. President, the gentleman who has contributed the best exposition of the necessity of water-power development, of the enormous significance it has for the future of our country, is Mr. Henry J. Pierce, of Seattle; and he is haunting the corridors of this Chamber to-day begging for the passage of a sensible bill upon this subject that will enable him to develop the Priest Rapids power site.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in reference to water powers on reservations, while I do not know that this has any direct bearing on the Senator's argument, as I recall, about 1908 quite a number of water-power sites were reserved or taken over by the Interior Department under the head of ranger stations and that sort of thing. I do not know whether they have ever been leased or not.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator is in error about that. A large amount of the area within the forest reserves was reserved for ranger stations, often, as many of us felt, without any justification whatever for such reservations. I regret to say that ordinarily these tracts thus reserved offered the highest kind of an invitation to people who would like to go there and homestead; and when they went they found that they were reserved for ranger stations. I think the reservation for ranger stations has been rather run into the ground; but I do not think it can be charged—at least, it never has been brought to my attention—that any power sites were thus reserved. Indeed, the law gave the right to reserve power sites for power-site purposes, and there would be no occasion to accomplish the end of their reservation under the claim that they were to be reserved for ranger stations.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not remember that the law gave that power prior to 1908. My impression was that the reservations were being made under that name, on the ground of being ranger stations, but in reality because they were suspected to possess certain importance as power sites.

Mr. WALSH. That may be true.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I do not think the law at that time gave the right. I am not sure what has happened since.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will understand that the Supreme Court has since decided that the President has the power to reserve for almost any cause he sees fit to reserve without the necessity of direct authorization by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator cares to be interrupted for the purpose, I have here in the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture that we have recently had printed, I think the latest authority, in which he gives the amount of minimum and maximum horsepower in the national forests. He says:

> The totals thus found—

This is from the investigation of the Geological Survey, he says—

> The totals thus found for the United States—

That is, in the national forests—

> exclusive of Alaska and of the purchased areas in the Appalachian, are 8,497,600 horsepower minimum and 16,784,500 horsepower maximum.

Mr. WALSH. I am very much obliged to the Senator for the information. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to it.

Mr. President, not only is the fact that the imposition of a charge will not retard development demonstrated by the experience of the forest reserves, but there is additional proof of it; and I think that proof is found in the permit that was granted the Great Falls Water Power Co. to occupy, with its transmission lines and other works, certain portions of the public domain. This permit is set out in Senate Document No. 1008 of the Sixty-second Congress, third session, made a public document upon the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

It will be understood that the Great Falls Water Power Co. was about to construct the great development at the Great Falls of the Missouri, of which I spoke a short time ago. The principal consumer of the power produced there was to be the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road. In order to effect the electrification of that road it became necessary to construct transmission lines across the public domain in many places, both within and without the forest reserves; and in order to acquire the right thus to construct the transmission lines it became necessary to acquire a permit from the Secretary of the Interior.

The permit is an exceedingly elaborate affair. It required the power company, as a condition of the permit, to pay into the Treasury of the United States an annual charge for the permission and the privilege which was accorded by it, and that charge was graduated upon the amount of power it produced. The terms are expressed in article 4 of the permit, which is as follows:

> The power company will pay annually, on or before February 1 in each year, by certified check to the order of the Secretary of the Interior, a rental charge at the rate of 5 mills ($0.005) per thousand kilowatt-hours for all energy delivered by it over the lines for which right of way is hereby sought during the preceding calendar year of the decade beginning on January 1, 1913, whether said delivery is made to the railway company under the said contract or otherwise or to other takers; and during each decade thereafter a rental charge at such reasonable rate per thousand kilowatt-hours so delivered to said railway company and to said other takers as the Secretary of the Interior may fix before the beginning of each decade for such deliveries, respectively.

That is to say, not only was a charge exacted for the privilege that was granted, but it was provided that the charge should be readjusted every 10 years, and it did not arrest development. The Great Falls Water Power Co. was glad enough to get the permit upon these terms, and the work of development has gone on.

So I repeat that nobody need have any very great dread that water-power development is going to be arrested if we put in the hands of the Secretary of War the right to make a charge such as the conditions seem reasonably to demand, taking into consideration all of the facts to which the bill relates as it will stand if the amendment which I offer shall be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to read from the testimony given by Mr. Merrill in the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands of the United States Senate on the water-power bill to show the estimated amount of horsepower in the forest reserves. I think I was well within the truth when I said that he had made the statement that the greater part of the western power to be developed was in the national forest reserves.

Mr. Merrill states as follows:

> In States containing national forests (which includes all the Western States, together with Arkansas, Minnesota, and South Dakota) there is a total of 20,800,000 horsepower, or a total of 74 per cent of all within the United States.
> The estimated total within the national forests is 11,700,000 horsepower, or 56 per cent of that within the above group and 42 per cent of the total within the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think those figures correspond very well with the ones that I gave here.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Senator give the figures.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the date of that testimony? I gave the minimum and the maximum, and the figures which the Senator has given are just about half-way between the two.

Mr. SMOOT. This testimony was given on Tuesday, December 22, 1914.

Mr. NORRIS. The statement I have, of course, is a little later, although from the same source.

Mr. SMOOT. It is from the same source?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply read this, Mr. President, to show that the statement I made, without looking up the testimony of Mr. Merrill, was substantially correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, as I understand, had it a little bit larger than that. The Senator from Tennessee had it considerably higher than that.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator from Utah will refer to the late document, No. 316, submitted in the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture January 17, 1916, he will find the precise statement as given by the Senator from Nebraska on page 18.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has not denied that. The Senator from Utah simply read this to support the statement he had made in answer to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood that the Senator was referring to testimony taken two years ago. This report is made at a later date.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any real discrepancy between the testimony of Mr. Merrill given in 1914 and the prepared statement of Mr. Merrill as published in the document from which the Senator is now reading.

Mr. Pierce, the gentleman referred to by the Senator from Montana, a leading citizen of the State of Washington, in the same hearing gives these figures:

	Horsepower.
North Atlantic States	4,910,000
South Atlantic States	5,107,000
North Central States	4,270,000
South Central States	3,342,000
Western States	44,049,000

Those were the figures from which I quoted when I made the statement of the maximum amount of power that could be developed in the Western States was 44,049,000 horsepower.

Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate briefly in relation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, to strike out the words "based upon its value as land" on page 6 of the bill, line 22.

The other day the question arose as to whether the Secretary of War had approved of this bill or of a similar bill, and at that time I made the statement that I thought he had. I find that in the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, on the question of amendment of the general-dam act, the Secretary of War makes this statement under the head, "Shall a Federal charge be laid upon the privileges?"

Aside from any question of Federal authority that may be thought by some to be involved, in my judgment, and as a matter of policy, this question should be answered in the negative. Many who have the cause of conservation at heart have heretofore urged, and doubtless will urge again, that any legislation for the development of water power on the navigable streams should provide for the Federal levy of a charge for horsepower for the privilege. The reasons thus far advanced for the proposition do not appear to me to be sound. In the case of navigable streams the Federal Government owns neither the water nor the bed of the stream; its power comes from a right to say what obstructions may or may not be placed in the stream. Upon a navigable stream the Government owns nothing, has nothing to sell.

Those who advocate the levying of such a charge first assigned as their purpose the accumulation of a fund to be devoted to the further improvement of navigation. This, it seems, has been abandoned, and the contention now made is that by means of this charge the Federal Government can more effectually exercise its control over the development. I have heretofore said that in my judgment the State should be left free to impose such taxes, charges, and excises as it might see fit to impose upon the property and the business authorized by the grant. I can see no sufficient reason, as a matter of policy, to justify the levying of an additional charge by the Government of the United States. The Federal Government does not qualify the grantee nor give him the primary authority to engage in the business. The property of the grantee is private property, situate within a State. The title is a title under local law, and the protection of the property comes from the local law and not from the Federal Government. If such a Federal charge were levied, its only effect, so far as I can see, would be to increase the rates and charges to the ultimate consumer, for it can not be doubted that such fixed charges have to be shifted to the consumer, and directly so where there is public regulation and control.

And I might proceed, Mr. President, to read further the testimony under this heading, but I do not think it is necessary, because what I have already read states specifically the opinion of the Secretary of War.

Under the heading "In the creation and improvement of navigable capacity, and not in a money charge, lies the great Federal benefit," the Secretary says this:

To assume that the Federal Government will get no direct benefit, or will get less than it ought to get of such benefit, if it does not impose a charge upon the development of water power, is to ignore one great reason for and one great useful result of the development of power on the navigable rivers, namely, the creation and improvement of navigable capacity without expense to the Federal Government. That such development must give such a result is not a matter of speculation; it is a certainty. Such must necessarily be the result, and the larger and more general the development of power the greater will be the creation and improvement of navigation.

Mr. President, let us not deceive ourselves in this matter. Let us go right to the root of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana and discuss the object of it and why it is offered. Before I state what I think the object of the amendment is I want to read an amendment that the Senator intends to offer if this amendment of his is adopted, for I have in my hand the bill, with all of the proposed amendments of the Senator interlined, and under a heading of subdivision (g) the Senator proposes to offer this amendment:

In cases in which no lands of the United States are to be occupied, that the grantee shall pay to the United States, for the rights acquired hereunder, such reasonable annual charges as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that that amendment has already been offered, and the Senate has rejected it. That is to say, I offered a page in lieu of the entire page of which that forms a part, that being the feature that was really discussed. So the matter has already been passed upon. The Senator may not have been here at the time.

Mr. SMOOT. If it was discussed, Mr. President, I will say that I happened to be out of the Chamber at the time. But the object of the present amendment is that whatever charge is imposed for the occupation of the land shall be based upon the amount of horsepower developed, and the Senator from Montana would impose a charge for power developed on a navigable stream whether the Government of the United States is the owner of one foot of the land used or not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator for a minute. Is it not practically the same thing when he proposes to make an annual charge in excess of the value of the land? Is it not making an element of charge for the water, in which the Government of the United States has no more right than you have or I have? And is it not practically the same provision as is made with relation to the charge where there is some Government land lying contiguous to the stream?

Mr. SMOOT. It is exactly the same in principle. There is no difference whatever.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call attention to the fact that no matter whether the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Colorado agree with the Senator from Montana and others like him or not, they will at least have to admit that that amendment is perfectly consistent with the amendment that is now pending and that has been offered by the Senator from Montana. The amendment now pending, if it should prevail, would give the Secretary of War authority to charge on the horsepower developed where public land was used, and the other amendment would give him like authority where public land was not used. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe that is a fair statement?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, all of the amendments that have been offered by the Senator from Montana are to carry out the plan as stated by me. There is no question about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody has disputed it, so far as I know.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not disputing it.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator from Utah, and likewise the Senator from Colorado, were trying to convey the idea that there was something inconsistent in these two amendments—the one that has been offered and the one that the Senator proposes to offer later on.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. All the amendments offered by the Senator from Montana down to and including the bottom of page 6 of the bill lead to one and the same thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. They all have but one object. It is for the Senate to decide the question whether or not they want to authorize the Secretary of War to impose upon the power company an annual charge of so much per horsepower developed by the company.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the fundamental principle that is really involved, I think, in this amendment, and upon which there is a disagreement among us. I fully agree with the Senator from Montana that we ought to clothe the Secretary with such authority whether he uses public land or whether he does not. The Senator from Utah takes the opposite view, and, of course, those who drew this bill have taken the opposite view, and the entire theory of the bill is the opposite theory.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the power is to be given by the Congress of the United States to the National Government to impose a charge for something that it does not own, does not the Senator think we ought to amend the Constitution so as to vest that power in the National Government?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, in his time, to answer the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I argued the question at some length yesterday. I do not know whether the Senator from Colorado was here or not. I do not care to go into the question again. I convinced myself, at least, that the amendment of the Senator from Montana ought to prevail. I think the Senator will get an answer to his question, however, if he will take this course.

If those who favor the bill as it is drawn agree with the Senator from Colorado that it is unconstitutional, then you can save a whole lot of valuable time by permitting the amendment to go in. If you think it does not have any legal effect, then do not oppose it so bitterly. If, as you think, we are going to sell something that we have not got, we can not hurt anybody, nor give any good title to it. If that be the theory, all you have to do is to concede, for the purposes of the argument, that these amendments may go in, and you will not hurt anybody. If we have not the right to make the charge, the charge will not be legal if we make it.

I can hardly believe that the Senators think that this kind of a charge would not be sustained by the Supreme Court, or they would not spend so much time and take such a deep interest, as all others do who believe in that theory, in preventing Congress from enacting a law to that effect.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the statement which the Senator has made as to whether the charge would be sustained by the Supreme Court is not in this case of effect, because the Government of the United States by simply saying, "We will not permit development; we will not enter into this contract; we will not give you the permission," of course can stop all development, and consequently it can, in effect, notwithstanding it is unconstitutional, notwithstanding it is illegal, in an extreme case perhaps force some person who would make something by reason of the investment to go on with it. But it will not produce a general development. That is the difficulty. We are trying to get legislation here that will produce development and will not conserve these waters for future generations when every day they are going to waste.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am opposed to the Government of the United States assuming powers within a State that rightfully belong to the State, and in so doing tie up many of the resources of the State. It seems to me that if this bill becomes a law in the shape in which the Senator from Montana desires it to pass, and if the so-called Ferris power bill, which affects all the Western States, becomes a law, there will be a conflict of authority between the Government and every State in which the provisions of the bills are operative.

The Senator from California the other day called particular attention to the powers vested in the public-utility commission of the State of California; and if the Ferris bill becomes a law as reported to the Senate and now upon the calendar, there is no question but what dual authority will exist and long-drawn-out suits in the courts will be the result.

Mr. President, I was going into a discussion of the Ferris bill to-day in connection with the discussion of the pending measure, as other Senators have done so, but I think I will wait until the Ferris bill comes before the Senate for consideration. As far as my State is concerned this bill would have no effect upon it whatever, because we have no navigable streams in the State; but it seems to me there is the same objectionable principle in this bill, if amended as the Senator from Montana desires it amended, as is in the Ferris power bill.

This is no new question, Mr. President. I was told some years ago that the development of water powers of the West would be held up until there was legislation by Congress in conformity with the views of the then Forester, and up to this time the prediction has been virtually carried out. I believe, Mr. President, if the country knew the true conditions as they exist, if it really knew the hardships which the Western States have had to bear under this policy there would be very few votes in either House of Congress to continue it or to place a further burden upon the people as the bill will place upon them if passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator feel that he has been derelict in the past 10 years in not calling the attention of the country to that condition?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been called to the attention of the Senate spasmodically at times when we had just about as many Senators in the Chamber as we have at this time. I really think, Mr. President, that the people of the Western States have been derelict in not calling the conditions existing to the attention of the country. They have had no publicity bureau, as have the proponents of this class of legislation. I think if the Western States had started eight years ago and called the attention of the American people to conditions as they have done in the last year, if conferences had been held as was held at Portland last year there would have been a different sentiment throughout the country from what there is to-day.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to ask the Senator how long he thinks it would take the western people to come to his idea about it?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite hear the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH. How long does the Senator think it would take the people of the country to come into an acceptance of his idea about it?

Mr. SMOOT. I think just as soon as they were informed of the conditions they would come to it.

Mr. WALSH. Would the Senator like to continue that deadlock?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, whenever a man comes up to me and says, "You have got to yield to what I desire, or if you do not, I will see that your every effort for advancement is blocked; you have got to conform to my idea or no development shall be had." I want to say to the Senator from Montana that if I feel that I am right I will never say, "Well, if I can not have a whole loaf, give me a half of one." I am willing to wait until there is a change of sentiment, and I would stand it as long as the other party could.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator if that is not about what he said when he was at the convention in Portland, that he was going to stand on his feet until everything faded out of existence but that he would prevent the passage of what is known as the Ferris bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No, I did not say that. I said that I would do all in my power to secure its defeat. I said, however, that I thought more than likely the bill would pass, but I did not know exactly in what state, nor did anyone else know outside of the Secretary of the Interior, because I expected the bill to be made in conference and not on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not misquote the Senator, of course, and I do not pretend to quote him, but the report of the convention that was held out there, as I remember, reported the Senator as saying that he would not permit that bill to pass under any circumstances as long as he could stand on his feet, or something to that effect. Now, is not that showing the same spirit the Senator says is shown on the other side by those who are opposed to the bill as he wants it?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it is the same spirit, Mr. President, because they are the ones assuming a power, and in doing so tying up the development of waters that absolutely belong to the State. The Government of the United States has no right whatever to the waters of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is the Senator's idea, but the Senator does not mean to say that no one else can hold a different view and not be equally honest, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, those who favored the passage of the bill in the last Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not intimated such a thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Senator assumes that everyone who does not agree with him and favors something like the Ferris bill in the last Congress is trying to tie up the development of water power in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not trying to do it. It has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. They have not passed the bill. There has not been any opportunity for development to take place under that bill, because it has never been passed.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator takes that position, he no doubt feels about the same as the Senator from Montana; I think the Senator from Nebraska feels that he is right, and that anyone who opposes his views is wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; I want to say to the Senator that while I feel I am right, and while I believe development would take place under the Ferris bill and would take place under this bill if the proposed amendment and other similar ones which will be offered along the line of the Senator from Montana were adopted, I have never taken the position that I wanted to stand as an obstructionist against the passage of any law unless I could get just what I wanted.

Now, the Senator must not classify those who are opposed to a bill as he wants it as being obstructionists. He may think we are. He is honest in his belief that if we do not have the bill as he wants it development will not take place. I have no objection to his holding that opinion, but it does not follow that we are any less sincere in desiring to bring about development or that we are any less honest in our convictions as to what would bring about development.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah never said that under the bill if it is passed there would be no development. The Senator from Utah takes the position that the Government of the United States has no control whatever over the waters of a State, and it can not do indirectly what it can not do directly, and Government control over the waters of a State is what the Ferris bill undertakes to confer——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's position is logical, then, no matter what we pass in Congress, it will not have any effect because we have not anything to do with it. So we had better not pass any bill, and water development will take place. Why has there not been development without a law?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, we know why water power has not been developed. The Senator from Nebraska knows why it has not been developed. As soon as an application for a power site reached Washington the land applied was immediately withdrawn from entry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to get the viewpoint of the Senator from Utah a little more clearly. Is he in favor of the provisions of the bill as they are reported so far as this immediate point is concerned?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill is not satisfactory to me, but I would very much prefer the bill as it is drawn than as it would be if the amendment of the Senator from Montana were adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see. May I ask another question along that line?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator believe that in ascertaining the value of the property that is to be used in the improvement there should be taken into account the benefit or advantage of the people generally in navigation?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator believes that the value of the public land that may be used for a power site should be appraised in the same way as if the land belonged to a private individual, and the courts should decide its value in case of a dispute under the rules of law that have been so well established in the past.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just the position taken by the Senator from Tennessee and it has a great deal of force in it, but I am trying to find out whether the Senator from Utah is opposing this particular amendment because he thinks that if it is defeated the value of the land will be determined in the way he has suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; that is not the object of the amendment, and that will not be the result. If the amendment of the Senator from Montana is adopted the result will be that the Secretary of War will have absolute power to charge whatever he sees fit upon the amount of horsepower that is developed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Montana is defeated and the bill is passed in its present form, does not the Senator from Utah think that in fixing the value of the land the Secretary of War can take into account the benefits of the people generally in navigation?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; under the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that the Secretary of War can also take into account the benefits to the grantee?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the bill he can.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Utah intend to support those provisions?

Mr. SMOOT. I would very much rather see those provisions out, but I very much prefer them to the bill if the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. If those two provisions shall remain in the bill, what possible element of value can be considered if the amendment of the Senator from Montana prevails that can not be considered if it fails?

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment of the Senator from Montana prevails, then it will not be a question of the value of the land at all. There will be no restriction whatever upon the power of the Secretary of War. He can lay an annual charge upon the water power developed annually; or, in other words, the real object of the amendment is that the Secretary of War shall have absolute control over the business or the corporation and fix an annual charge based upon the power generated.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WORKS. As I understand the difference between these two propositions it is that one of them goes to the value of the land and the other goes to the value of the use of the water. One proposes to charge the people for the value of the land and the other proposes to fix a tax upon the water that is developed and supplied.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of War says that the Government of the United States does not own the water and we all understand that to be true. He says there is nothing for the Government to sell.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand perfectly that the Government does not own the water, but I hardly think the observation of the Senator from California is accurate. The bill provides for a way in which the Secretary of War shall fix the annual charge for the use of the land.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the bill does not provide for the annual charge.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon, whether an annual charge or a gross charge for the whole period, it does not make any difference.

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion there is quite a difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not in principle.

Mr. SMOOT. It is in practice, however.

Mr. WORKS. The mistake the Senator makes is that one is value of the land and the other is value of the water. One belongs to the Government and the other does not. That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no suggestion in regard to the value of water or the use of water.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that if the charge is upon the amount of power developed, then, of course, they will have to charge upon the water because of the fact that the water determines the amount of power created.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is not a word in the bill with regard to charging upon the basis of the water power developed or any other kind of power developed. The bill says that the grantee shall pay the United States such reasonable charges, based upon the value of the land, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War. In fixing those charges for the use of the land, the bill so declares, "consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation." That is to say, as I have already remarked this afternoon, it will be the duty of the Secretary of War to diminish the charges for the use of the land by the benefits which accrue to the general public in the improvement of the river for navigation. On the other hand, the Secretary of War must take into account in determining the charges for the use of the land the benefit or advantage of the grant to the business of the grantee. In that way the whole subject as to what the Secretary of War shall charge for the use of the land is open for the Secretary of War to consider. It is my opinion—I give it for what it is worth—that the very thing against which the Senator from Utah complains would be accomplished if the amendment of the Senator from Montana is defeated and the words to which I have referred remain in the statute.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator takes exactly the opposite view of that language that I do. If the words are stricken out, the bill would read in this way:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

That is the way it would read if the amendment of the Senator from Montana were adopted. But that is not the intention of the framers of the bill, and I do not believe the construction can be placed upon the words as used in the bill the Senator gives it, for this reason. It says:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land.

Now, in fixing the charges of the land——

Mr. CUMMINS. Charges for the occupation of the land.

Mr. SMOOT. For the occupation of the land, the Secretary of War shall take into consideration "the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation."

That does not mean if the benefit to navigation was worth to the United States $500,000 that amount would be deducted from the value of the occupation of the land, as intimated by the Senator in his remarks a short time ago; but the Secretary of War is to consider this advantage to the Government, if it is an advantage, in determining the reasonable charges based upon the value of the land, and not only that, in fixing those reasonable charges based upon the value of the land the Secretary of War is also to take into consideration the advantages to the business of the grantee. That is only, in my opinion, affecting the value of the land, so that reasonable charges can be based upon the land, and not upon the water.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am utterly unable to follow the Senator from Utah in his analysis. The Secretary of War is endeavoring to ascertain the charge that shall be made for the use of the land which the grantee desires to occupy. The bill that is before us says, first, that the charge shall be based upon the value of the property as land, on the land as land; that is the first thing it says. Then it says that the charge shall also be based upon other considerations, namely, the value of the improvement to the public in the way of navigation and the value of the grant to the person who is to carry on the business. As it looks to me, it is utterly impossible to escape from the conclusion that the bill as reported gives to the Secretary of War the authority to make any charge for the use of the land that in his judgment is fair and reasonable, taking into account the value of the improvement to the public and the value of the enterprise to the grantee. I can not conceive of any consideration affecting the charge which will not be embraced within one or the other of these classes.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I can not see but that the wording of the bill, without an amendment, is perfectly plain. It does seem to me that that is so, where the bill says:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges, based upon its value as land.

Or, in other words, the Secretary of War is not to charge the grantee a rate based upon the amount of water that is flowing over the dam; he is not allowed to do that under the bill. If he were allowed to do that, then, of course, we might just as well accept the provisions of the Western States power bill, which it is expected to pass, imposing a tax of so much per horsepower development; but this bill does not say that it shall be based upon the amount of water flowing over the dam.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not, and it ought not to say that; but does not the bill require the Secretary of War to take into consideration, in fixing the charge, the value of the use of the land to the business of the grantee?

Mr. SMOOT. It does; and, Mr. President, I admit that. I stated before that, in my opinion, all that should be taken into consideration is the value of the land, fixed by the regular rules of law, just the same as if the land were owned by an individual.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Utah would propose to strike out everything after the words "Secretary of War," in line 23, then he would accomplish his purpose——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; but——

Mr. CUMMINS. But to simply oppose the amendment of the Senator from Montana without insisting that these other qualifications shall be stricken out is, it seems to me, fighting a windmill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will agree with the Senator from Iowa that, according to my theory of legislation, that should be done; but I have no hope whatever that such a provision would ever pass the House of Representatives. I think this is the best compromise that the framers of the bill could make.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I hope the Senator from Utah is not satisfied with that means of arriving at the value of the land.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have said I was not.

Mr. WORKS. There is a false element included in it, namely, the value of the land to the corporation that constructs the improvement. That has nothing to do with the value of the land. In the hands of the Government the same elements enter into the value of land as when it is in the hands of an individual. If some private individual were selling the land to another party for the purpose of developing power, we certainly could not insist that the owner should be paid on the basis of what it would be valuable for in the hands of the purchaser after the improvement was made. I am a little bit surprised that the Senator from Utah is content to support the bill, even with that provision in it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have already stated that the bill is not what I should like it to be. I agree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] as to this provision, and I believe I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]—that is, if I understand his position—that whatever the Government is paid for the value of the land it should be on the same basis as if the payment were to an individual. Is that the position taken by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not taken any position with regard to the proper charge to be made to the grantee. I will discuss that at a later time. I only say that the friends of this bill have been arguing it upon the assumption that the bill practically authorized the Secretary of War to fix the same value upon the land that would be fixed by the rules of law in condemnation proceedings; and I have been trying to say that that is not a proper or accurate analysis or interpretation of the bill. I have been trying to make it clear, if I could, that even if the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is defeated, still the grantee will be compelled to pay, for the occupation of the land, charges that are based upon the value of the land to his business or the business that is about to be carried on through the improvement, whatever it may be, and that the Secretary of War may also take into account—I suppose it would operate as a depreciation of the charge—the fact that the public is to be benefited through the improvement of the river for navigation; and that neither of those considerations would be competent in a trial at law for the ascertainment of the value of property.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my theory of the bill is entirely different from the theory of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I think these questions ought to be left entirely to the States. I think the States ought to have absolute control. I have offered a Senate bill, No. 3522, providing for the acquisition by the States, under certain conditions, of any lands therein which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power. Under that bill it would be absolutely impossible to create a monopoly of water power; under the bill it would be absolutely impossible for the power companies to charge unreasonable rates for power developed; under the bill there are restrictions made that the transfer of the property can not be accomplished without the consent, not only of the public-utilities commission of the State, but of the Government of the United States as well. It provides that the States shall make application for water-power sites. It provides that the title—not a complete title, but a restricted one—shall go to the States; and the public-utility commissions of the States shall regulate the prices to be charged for power. If that bill, Mr. President, were passed all of the interests of the people of this country would be conserved; no monopoly could be created, and there would never be a conflict of authority between the Government of the United States and the States.

I am fearful, Mr. President, if the power contemplated by this bill is given to the Government of the United States that the Western States will have the same experience with water-power development and control as they have had in connection with the withdrawal of coal lands and the withdrawal of forest lands within the States, although I wish to pause here to say that the forest lands within the States have been far better administered for the interests of the people of the States than have withdrawals of other lands. It is next to impossible, Mr. President, to secure capital to develop coal lands in the West at present. I want to say to Senators of the United States that coal lands have been classified and valued, and a price per acre put upon them as high as $400. How can an individual or a corporation paying that price for coal lands yet undeveloped, when nobody knows how thick the veins may be or how much coal may be under the ground, compete with companies in existence which own their coal lands outright, have their market, and have railroad accommodations? It is next to impossible.

Mr. President, I received a letter the other day, calling my attention to a condition of affairs in the State of Utah which I did not conceive could exist; and I fully believe now that when the matter is brought to the attention of the Chief Forester he will see that the wrong is righted, although he has already had one examination made of the case. A few people down in the southeastern part of Utah, over 100 miles from a railroad, following the business of raising stock, with ranches miles apart, living adjacent to the Powell National Forest Reserve, decided that they would build a schoolhouse in order that their children might attend school during the summer months. An entry upon land outside of the forest reserve for town-site purposes was made. The people built a schoolhouse and agreed that on the land entered for town-site purposes each head of a family should be allowed 1 acre for a summer home for the family, and allow the children to attend school during the summer months.

Mr. President, no sooner was their schoolhouse erected than there was an Executive order issued placing the land entered within the forest reserve. What happened then? A supervisor came and told the men who had built the schoolhouse and who had begun to build their little summer homes that they could not get title to the land; that it had been withdrawn and placed in a forest reserve. They were told, "If you want to live here, if you want to erect your buildings, if you want your children to go to school in the schoolhouse which you have constructed, you have got to pay the Government of the United States an annual rental of $10 an acre." Nobody claims that the land is worth $10 an acre. I rather glory in the spunk of the people when they decided, rather than to submit to such treatment, they would leave and see if they could not provide some other way for the education of their children.

Mr. President, I do not know what is going to come of the power development in the West, or what will be the result if the power proposed to be given is lodged in the hands of a bureau here in Washington.

I am not worried about the 50-year term provided by this bill. I have no doubt in my mind that before the end of 50 years electricity will not be carried for power purposes over copper wires. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that before a generation passes there will be discovered a successful system for the storage of electricity—generating and storing it at the water-power sites and carrying it so stored to any part of the United States—so that one will be able to buy it for lighting, for heating, and for all the purposes for which power is required in the home, as well as for the propelling of all kinds of machinery.

I think, Mr. President, that whatever charge is imposed upon the development of power within a State ought to go to the State. The State is entitled to it, in order to maintain the State institutions and to help keep law and order.

I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will not be adopted. I shall have more to say upon this question when another bill which affects the West so vitally is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee that peace obtains throughout our borders, and we most earnestly and fervently pray that we may not be drawn into the vortex of the war now raging among our sister nations across the seas. Give, we beseech Thee, wisdom to our President and his advisers, that all international questions may be amicably adjusted with honor and justice to all, that we may be able to maintain strict neutrality "with malice toward none and charity for all." And we will ascribe all praise to Thee, through Him who taught us love and good will to all mankind. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understood in hearing the reading of the Journal that the Journal stated I reserved points of order on the rivers and harbors bill. It should be the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] reserved points of order on the rivers and harbors bill.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected in that regard. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] reserved points of order against the rivers and harbors bill. Without objection, the Journal as read and amended will be approved.

There was no objection.

PASSENGERS ON MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House authorize the printing of 5,000 additional copies of House resolution No. 147, introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCLEMORE] on the 22d of February, 1916.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] asks unanimous consent that the House order printed 5,000 additional copies of the resolution introduced by Mr. McLemore on the subject of keeping Americans off foreign ships. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Committee on Printing has the authority to order all the copies that may be called for. Is not that correct, I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know what the resolution is. I was not paying strict attention.

Mr. MANN. It is a resolution offered in the House.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. Additional copies can be ordered without this resolution, Mr. Speaker; and even if they could not, the proper way to proceed would be to introduce a bill or resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Printing. We have no estimate now of what it would cost.

Mr. MANN. My understanding is that when a bill or resolution is introduced into the House the usual number of copies are printed, and when more calls are received additional copies can be printed.

Mr. BARNHART. I understand that is the case.

Mr. HULBERT. The supply in the document room is exhausted. I know that various Members have requests for copies of this resolution. I will ask the Chair——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that the gentleman from New York consult with the members of the Committee on Printing, and no doubt the matter can be worked out satisfactorily.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the conference report.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 257).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11 and 14, and agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the Senate, Nos. 2, 5, 11, and 14, to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the said amendments, namely:

No. 2: Strikes out the appropriation of $25,000, inserted by the Senate, for the preparation of a suitable design for the Arlington Memorial Bridge.

No. 5: Strikes out the appropriation of $7,500, inserted by the Senate, for clerical services in the Division of Mexican Affairs of the State Department.

No. 11: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, transferring the sum of $120,000 from appropriations for wages to the appropriation for material in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and increases the number of delivered sheets of currency from 82,000,000 to 90,000,000.

No. 14: Appropriates $9,500, as proposed by the Senate, for the addition to the Powell School.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There was some discussion heretofore in the House in reference to the power plant and the Fine Arts Commission. I have a letter from Col. Harts, the secretary of the Fine Arts Commission, which I would like to have inserted in the RECORD for the information of the House. I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does he explain that the Fine Arts Commission has nothing to do with the agitation?

Mr. MANN. He explains how the Fine Arts Commission had nothing to do with the Grant Memorial or the Agricultural Building, which we all knew, but what we call the predecessor of the Fine Arts Commission did have some information of the movement. However, he does give some information of what was done by the Fine Arts Commission, which is valuable information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a letter from Col. Harts on the Fine Arts Commission. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: My attention has several times lately been called to what appears to be a misapprehension of certain facts concerning the Commission of Fine Arts by Members of Congress, undoubtedly due to information volunteered by others which is misleading and inaccurate. I have felt that you would welcome a statement regarding the facts in the case, as shown by our records, and I therefore venture to address you in connection with such matters as have been drawn to my attention.

It has been asserted that the Commission of Fine Arts is responsible for the location of the Grant Memorial on its present site. The facts are these: The Grant Memorial Commission selected the unoccupied portion of the Botanic Garden grounds, where the Grant Memorial is now located, as the site for that memorial, and their selection was approved by Congress in the sundry civil act approved June 30, 1906, in the following words:

"Provided That the memorial may be located in the unoccupied portion of the Botanic Garden grounds, between First and Second Streets, as recommended by the Grant Memorial Commission."

As the National Commission of Fine Arts was created by Congress on May 17, 1910, this action was taken four years before the commission came into existence.

Similarly the commission has been criticized and condemned for its alleged action in locating the present buildings of the Department of Agriculture on their site on the south side of the Mall. Work on the erection of the two wings, I am informed, was started December 14, 1904, discontinued temporarily February 25, 1905, and again started toward final completion April 7, 1905. They were completed March 16, 1908, more than two years before the Commission of Fine Arts came into existence. The commission has never had the opportunity to pass on any matter connected with the Department of Agriculture buildings.

The commission has also been criticized by Members of Congress at various times with reference to the placing of the three large flag poles on the Union Station Plaza, the interior arrangement of rooms in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and other matters with which they have had absolutely no connection and regarding which they have never had the opportunity to express an official opinion.

Furthermore, the National Commission of Fine Arts, for which appropriation is being made from year to year by Congress, should be distinguished from the so-called council of fine arts, which ceased to exist in 1909, and which did not have congressional sanction. The council was created by Executive order of President Roosevelt on January 19, 1909, but was dissolved by Executive order of President Taft on May 21, 1909, after an existence of only four months. It consisted of 30 members—architects, painters, sculptors, landscape architects, and several laymen—appointed by the President. The National Commission of Fine Arts, however, is the creation of Congress. Its seven members constitute the official body of expert advisers of the Government in the various branches of the fine arts; they represent the highest talent in the artistic professions in America to-day, and serve without compensation for their services. They are reimbursed for their actual expenses incurred, but even here their expenditures for subsistence—room at hotel and meals—are limited to $5 per day, so that it happens that at every meeting members of the commission are obliged to spend more for subsistence than they can be reimbursed for. I know of no organization anywhere where men of such eminent standing, reputation, skill, and professional ability are willing to give what amounts to important professional services without pay, purely from patriotic motives.

The President, various committees of Congress, departmental heads, and others are regularly availing themselves of the opportunity afforded by this commission. In fact, submissions to the commission during the past fiscal year numbered 128, more than twice as many as were submitted in any preceding year; an evidence that the commission's work is constantly growing and that their services are of conspicuous benefit to the United States. In some cases where Federal appropriation has paid for the erection of a monument, such as the Tyler Monument at Richmond, Va., and the Nathanael Greene monument at Guilford Courthouse, N. C., the commission has been consulted five to six times in one year to insure the best artistic results for the United States. The scope of its duties and the demands made upon the time of the members have so enlarged that it will be necessary for the commission to double the meetings and extend the duration of each in the future.

The commission is now almost 6 years old. Since its creation it has saved many thousands of dollars to the Government by giving expert advice, where formerly fees have been paid experts for such services; and it has insured in the nearly 400 submissions that have come before it during that period that the United States has been protected from inferior art. Among such matters, for instance, it has advised the Senate Committee on the Library against the purchase of various paintings which were inferior works of art, and which, if purchased, would have cost the United States thousands of dollars—in fact, within a few thousands of the total amounts appropriated for the commission's maintenance during its six years of existence. By direction of Congress, a committee of the commission spent nine strenuous days in the Canal Zone, and later made a report to Congress upon the artistic character of the structures of the canal; among other things, this included recommendations regarding the plan and layout for the proposed new city of Balboa at the Pacific end of the canal, which were followed in the erection of that city.

Its advice is invariably in the direction of simplicity and against ornateness. The commission has always discouraged ornament when used either for its own sake or at the expense of harmony. Sometimes it has been charged that the recommendations of the commission could not be followed because of expense involved, but in no case has this been true excepting where a designer has slighted some parts of his work in order to make a display in other parts. The commission feels strongly that Government work should set a standard of excellence and thoroughness, and its recommendations have already resulted in marked improvements in the beauty and artistic character of monuments and public buildings planned for and erected in Washington, as well as of monuments erected elsewhere under Federal appropriation.

The commission's invariable recommendations in the direction of simplicity of design, as is witnessed especially in its advice given upon the designs for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the District of Columbia Armory, its elimination of designs for statues and other structures that have little or no artistic merit, and the assurance that whatever of an artistic character is being placed in Washington by the Government has had the scrutiny of the foremost men of the artistic professions in America to-day, are of such value to Congress and the future of the Nation's Capital that a knowledge of the facts seems all that is necessary to insure a high appreciation of its services.

Please pardon me for going into this matter at such length, but I felt that the Commission of Fine Arts has had so few opportunities to reply to unjust criticism that I am especially desirous that these facts should be made plain to you. It appears that often when the advice of the commission is contrary to the judgment of architects or others who have prepared and submitted their designs there seems to be a readiness to blame the commission for what was actually their own shortcomings; but there seems to be no one to explain how many beneficial results have followed and how the very existence of the Commission of Fine Arts is now an incentive to artists to do their utmost when they know that their designs or creations, proposed for acquisition by the Government, must be scrutinized by these experts.

If not inconsistent with the proprieties of the case, I would appreciate it if this letter could be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that the facts may be laid before such Members of Congress who have been misinformed.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. W. HARTS,
Colonel, United States Army,
Secretary and Executive Officer.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that it is a news item, an article written by a staff correspondent of that paper, respecting battle cruisers used in the European war. I desire to extend my remarks on the general subject and insert this article.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no objection to the gentleman's extending remarks, but I object to the insertion of a newspaper article.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. It is not an editorial article. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] objects to the insertion of the article. Is there objection to the gentleman extending his own remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (ch. 1759, 33 Stat. L., p. 440), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails without postage stamps affixed quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter mailed at the special rates of 1 cent and 2 cents a copy, and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter, and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has conceded that every remaining paragraph in the bill is subject to a point of order. My inquiry is whether a point of order would lie against all the remaining paragraphs at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They will have to be read and the points of order made seriatim?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that as to all of these sections except one or two there is no contest. They have all passed the House heretofore. They are purely administrative propositions, and unless there is a real desire to defeat them, it might as well go through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My thought was to facilitate the business of the House.

Mr. MOON. It would if there is to be no contest, but I suppose there is no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman cares to have them read, I have no objection, and the points of order can be made as we go along.

Mr. MOON. The Chair holds that they will have to be read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 157. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That postage stamps affixed to all mail matter or to stamped envelopes in which the same is inclosed shall when deposited for mailing or delivery be defaced by the postmaster at the mailing office: Provided, That when practicable postage stamps may be furnished to postmasters precanceled by printing on them the name of the post office at which they are to be used, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he really objects to that or if he is willing to have that section passed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he intends to make the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order for the present, in view of the interest of my friend from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMITH of Minnesota: Amend, by inserting as a new paragraph after the word "prescribe," in line 8, on page 33, the following:

"That section 3928 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3928. Whenever the sender shall so request a receipt shall be taken on the delivery of any registered mail matter, showing to whom and when and the place where the same was delivered, which receipt shall be returned to the sender and be received in the courts as prima facie evidence of such delivery: Provided, That any official of the Post Office Department or any postmaster, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, upon being satisfied that the addressee is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt, may waive the requirement that said receipt shall show the place where said registered mail matter was delivered.'"

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have just offered makes only one change in existing law, and that is, it requires the registered receipt to show the place where the mail matter was delivered in addition to what the law now requires, which is to show to whom and when it was delivered. The object of this legislation is to make it possible for a merchant to locate, through the assistance of the post office, customers who change their address and who neglect to notify him of that change.

In December, 1914, Senator LODGE introduced in the Senate the following bill:

That section 3928 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3928. Whenever the sender shall so request, a receipt shall be taken on the receipt of any registered mail matter, showing to whom, and when, and the place where the same was delivered, which receipt shall be returned to the sender and be received in the courts as prima facie evidence of such delivery."

A short time thereafter my distinguished colleague, Senator NELSON, introduced a bill of the same tenor as the Lodge bill. About the time of the introduction of the Lodge and Nelson bills Mr. W. L. Harris, one of the leading retail merchants of Minneapolis, wrote me that he considered this legislation wise and necessary and asked me to give it my support. On the first day of this session, in response to this request, I introduced H. R. 138, which, to all intents and purposes, is a duplicate of the Lodge and Nelson bills. I presented my bill to the Post Office Department for its approval. The department was of the opinion that under H. R. 138 it might be possible for a designing person to impose upon innocent parties, and for that reason withheld its approval. However, the department suggested that a bill in the language of H. R. 10399, which I introduced after my talk with the department, would overcome this objection and be acceptable to the department.

I sent Mr. Harris a copy of H. R. 10399, together with a statement of the department's attitude with reference to this subject, and received from him in reply the following:

FEBRUARY 8, 1916.

Your favor of the 5th instant received. Sorry the department can not indorse your original bill. Its suggestion, as embodied in H. R. 10399, is little better than nothing. Anyhow, we appreciate your interest.

Yours, very truly, W. L. HARRIS.

The amendment I offer is a substitute for both H. R. 138 and H. R. 10399 and I believe meets the objection and the suggestion of the department and at the same time preserves the registered-receipt plan, which is the one desired by the merchants. That there is an extensive and urgent demand for this legislation is evident by the great number of communications which I have received from retail merchants' associations and business firms. Mr. Harris, who has taken an active interest in the matter, has this to say:

We know of no one item connected with our Postal Service which would be of greater benefit to the business institutions of the country than the return of receipt to addressor containing complete data, and we see no reason why anyone's rights would be prejudiced thereby, for registered mail is always, of course, under cover and we can conceive of no circumstances which would create the slightest injustice or inconvenience to any honest addressee by filling out his receipt with both name and address.

The Postal Service should be, and is, the messenger of the public, and when the addressor pays the fee for registering a letter he is equitably entitled to knowledge, not merely that the addressee receives the letter, but the place at which he received the same. Is he not?

As the Postal Department found a way through its parcel-post system to serve the people of the United States, and incidentally insure the delivery of packages intrusted to its care, so can it logically, to our mind, do the same thing in effect with its registered letters, the specific postage required for same being in effect an insurance fee paid to the department by the addressor that the transaction shall be complete, and all information due the addressor furnished him before the transaction shall be considered closed.

Every credit man in the United States will rise up and call you blessed if you are successful in getting this bill through. After all, what is the Postal Department but the agent of individual or concern which pays a price for its missive or merchandise; and, while it is possible that, under a strained conception of logic, there might be in rare instances a disclosure of location under the bill proposed repugnant to the addressee, the great preponderance of the benefit is so strongly in favor of the business houses served as to cut no figure worth considering, it seems to us, and not the smallest factor of benefit would be that the passing of the bill in question gives the addressor the right to secure information from the department as to the delivery address of registered mail now distinctly denied under the present postal laws.

Our conclusions are, therefore, that the bill is distinctly a progressive step in the development of the Postal Service of the country and in fulfillment of the relations which should exist between the department and the business houses of the country.

If a man shall be required to sign his name to a receipt before he is given a registered letter, it is certainly logical that the address at which delivery was made should also be indicated, thus perfecting and carrying to its logical conclusion the spirit of registered mail service.

Under the present incomplete system a dishonest debtor can "skip" with a distinct purpose of evading the just claim of his creditor, and when, after diligent search, we ascertain that he is probably located in a certain city at a certain place we write him a registered letter, the receipt for which, under the present law, in many cases lacks complete verification, owing to absence of location data, and we do not know whether the letter was actually delivered at the address in question or forwarded to some other location.

Whatever opposition there may be to the bill must come from a desire to protect those not entitled to protection. The business community of the country undoubtedly spends hundreds of thousands of dollars annually in detective work, which could all be avoided by simply indicating on the receipt for registered letters the definite, specific address at which the same was delivered, a hardship to no one and an inestimable value to the whole community.

The Duluth Retail Credit Club, of Minnesota, wrote me as follows:

The Duluth retail merchants seem to be deeply interested in the bill which is known as H. R. 138 and was introduced by yourself. I feel justified in saying that this is heartily indorsed by Duluth, and we are in hopes that it will become effective in the near future; and I, as representing practically all of the retailers of Duluth since September, 1908, am authorized to express this as the wishes of the retailers of Duluth.

GEORGE C. FARLEY,
Secretary Duluth Retail Credit Club.

Messrs. Howard, Farwell & Co., piano dealers, of Minneapolis, wrote me that they felt that the information provided for in House bill 138 would be of great assistance to a great number of people, and that they would appreciate my efforts to promote the passage of this bill.

I also received communications from many other retail merchants from my section of the country recommending this measure and hoping that Congress would take favorable action on the same. Among the many prominent Minneapolis firms that urge such action are the following:

Hartman Furniture & Carpet Co.; Boutell Bros., complete house furnishers; Minneapolis Dry Goods Co.; Wm. A. French & Co., interior woodwork, decorations, furniture; Metropolitan Music Co.; Kronick Cleaning & Dyeing Co.; Palace Clothing House; John F. McDonald Lumber Corporation; R. M. Chapman Co., grocers, bakers, and confectioners; Gross Bros., cleaners, launderers, and dyers; Pike & Cook Co., builders; Barnum Trunk Co.; City Fuel Co.; H. P. McBride Co., grocers; Pure Oil Co.; Warner's Hardware; Brown Bros. Mercantile Co., tailors and furriers; L. S. Donaldson Co., department store; Woodward-Page Co., home furnishings; J. N. Smith & Co., plumbing; Laurence H. Lucker, phonographs.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. COX. What is the difference in the gentleman's proposed amendment and the section of the statute which he proposes to amend?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It simply adds the words "where delivered"—just those two words.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that the gentleman inserts those words "where delivered," or that he takes them out of the old statute?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I insert them. In the old law those words do not appear. If a man moves from one part of a large city to another without telling his grocery man or his butcher or his merchant of his new address, it necessitates locating him at a loss of considerable time and money. If the Post Office could be called in to assist in this matter, it would save this money and this loss of time and enable the merchant to extend further credit than he is now extending.

We have been busily engaged these many years in enacting laws that will make it possible for the bankers of the country to extend a greater amount of credit.

The Banking and Currency Committee of the House, of which I have the honor to be a member, is about to bring in a rural-credits bill that will enable the farmers of the country to use their credit to greater advantage. However, it is with deep regret that I must admit that there is not and never has been any serious effort made in the Congress of the United States or in any State legislature to enact a law that will make it easier for the laborer, the artisan, or the professional man of small means to secure credit. This class of our citizens is denied relief that is freely extended to other classes. They must look for assistance in time of distress to the grocer, the butcher, the dry-goods man, the furniture dealer, the druggist, the doctor, and the lawyer. These men, and these alone, are often the only barrier between the man in need of personal credit and starvation.

The amount of personal credit extended by the retail merchants of this country far exceeds the total amount of loans of our banks, notwithstanding that in the case of the bank the credit extended is always amply secured by good and sufficient collateral, whereas the credit extended by our merchants is not based upon security or collateral, but upon their faith in the honesty of mankind.

The Mr. Harris that I referred to is a splendid example of America's merchant princes. About 30 years ago he came to Minneapolis from the East and established a very modest store in my city for house furnishings and office supplies on a personal-credit plan. From that day to this no one has been denied credit at his store, the New England, unless he was generally known to be a deadbeat. This store maintains one price for all; the man of no means receives the same treatment as the millionaire. It is needless to say that the New England has prospered and grown to magnificent proportions; that its founder has won the love, confidence, and esteem of our citizens. Neither is it strange that a man of Mr. Harris's clear perception, business ability, and generous impulses should become so active in pointing out to Congress the necessity for a law similar to that embodied in my amendment.

If this amendment were enacted into law, it would enable the retail merchant to extend additional credit to a class of people that can not get it from any other source, and the consuming public would be relieved from the annual payment of hundreds of thousands of dollars now being spent by merchants in an effort to locate careless customers.

This great saving can be accomplished without any additional expense to the Government. For these reasons I hope the committee will adopt the amendment that I have offered.

The amendment is hedged about with such language as to make it apply only to a man who tries to conceal himself for the purpose of escaping his honest debts, and it does not seem wise that the Post Office Department should be a party in the way to assisting a man to conceal himself for that purpose; and the amendment is drawn in such a way that it is impossible to use it for any other purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman still has time——

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. No; my time is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman in my own time. This, as I understand it, would require the registry clerk at post offices to be satisfied the addressee is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt in case a person desired to waive the requirements of the receipt showing the place where such registered mail matter was delivered. Is not that imposing a duty upon the registry clerk that is almost sure to make trouble, to make the receipt prima facie evidence in court?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. That is the present law.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I have no objection to that, but the receipt as given now does show where the person receives the mail.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Not where he receives it, but when he received it.

Mr. MANN. Now the gentleman proposes to waive that if the registry clerk is satisfied that the person is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt. It seems to me very doubtful about putting that responsibility upon the postmaster or the registry clerk. The postmaster might be qualified to exercise such discretion, but the ordinary registry clerk in the ordinary post office of reasonable size ought not to have such a discretion imposed upon him.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. But it is not the registry clerk.

Mr. MANN. Who is it?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The authority is conferred upon the postmaster or any official of the Post Office Department under such rules and regulations as the department shall promulgate.

Mr. MANN. The language is, "That any official of the Post Office Department," and so forth, "upon being satisfied that the addressee is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt, may waive," and so forth. Practically, of course, that means a registry clerk, where they have a registry clerk, because it is not possible in the case of registered matter before the matter is delivered to take it up with the postmaster and determine whether this receipt shall not have the place of delivery.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I am afraid that my colleague misunderstands just how this will work out. Nothing will be done except what is now being done only to add to the receipt the place where the registered matter is delivered, and if the party wants to conceal himself for some purpose—we do not know what it may be—but if he wants to conceal himself, it will be necessary for him to go to the postmaster or some official of the Post Office Department and obtain an exemption, as it were, under this bill from the operation of the law.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, in the meanwhile he would not get the registered package. Now, if it is the intention to hold up the delivery of the registered package, very well. I do not believe we ought to impose upon postmasters or registry clerks in the ordinary course of business the requirement that they shall determine whether a man is desirous of concealing himself in order to avoid the payment of a debt.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It is for them to determine or satisfy themselves that this man is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt, and in all other cases the receipt has not only to show when, but where.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota would indicate what is undoubtedly the case in most cases, that there would not be such a requirement, but the purpose of inserting the language is to cover such cases as may arise. Now, I do not think when those cases arise we ought to leave to the clerk to determine whether a man is concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding the payment of his debts. How would he determine it?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. They would simply have to determine it; he has simply to satisfy himself. There is no legal determination.

Mr. MANN. He has to determine it in his own mind?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes; well——

Mr. MANN. And he would have to make a statement to that effect.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. He has to make such a statement as the department will require, whatever that may be. That is for the executive department to work out.

Mr. MANN. I am quite in sympathy with the original purpose of the bill. I do not think a requirement of that sort ought to be imposed upon postmasters or clerks. They are executive and administrative officials, and it is not their business to determine whether a man is trying to avoid the payment of his debts.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is it the idea of the gentleman that the proviso should be stricken out? If we do, that is my original idea; but the Post Office Department feels that there are times when certain men ought to be protected, and probably this is one of the times, when there is war abroad and there are certain people in our community who ought to be protected. Now, the proviso is intended to make it possible for the department to exercise that discretion when they think it is necessary.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman would offer an amendment leaving out this language—upon being satisfied that the addressee is not concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding a debt—

So that it would read—

Provided, That any official of the Post Office Department, or any postmaster, under regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, may waive the requirement that said receipt shall show the place where said registered mail matter was delivered.

I would not object to it.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The only trouble with that is that it may be too broad. There may be a class of people whose addresses we want to know, and we feel we have a right to know, and I do not want to make it broad enough to cover anything else.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I assume one of the purposes is this, that merchants may have sold goods to some one and the man has moved and left his address for the forwarding of mail at the post office. The man has not paid his bills; the merchant wants to be able to send him a registered letter to ascertain where he is living so as to bring action against him. That probably is a laudable purpose; still that is not part of the duty of the Post Office Department. I do not think that the responsibility ought to be placed upon the post-office officials to determine whether a man is trying to avoid the payment of his debts. We can not determine in ordinary life without trouble. I am perfectly willing to leave the Post Office Department the authority to waive the requirement if they desire to do so, under regulations which they may make.

I am not willing to impose upon the post-office clerks a requirement that they shall determine it. Perhaps that determination will be the cause of a libel suit.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I am willing to accept the amendment, but I am a little afraid it will be too broad. I think it is of importance. I have been informed that hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent annually by business men in securing the addresses of their customers who have changed from one place to another without notifying the merchant of such change. I do not claim that these men are dishonest, that they have secreted themselves for the purpose of avoiding a debt, but I do claim that they are careless and negligent, and the consequence is that the business house has to suffer, and ultimately the consumer has to pay the bill.

Mr. MANN. The theory of this amendment is this: The gentleman stated there is a war going on. Some man may not desire to give his residence to everybody who wishes to write him. They send him a registered package. Under this provision before the registered package can be delivered—and the man does not know from whom it comes—if he wants to have waived the requirement as to the place of receipt of the package, he has got to bring proof to the registry clerk and not try to avoid the payment of his debts. It might apply to the gentleman and myself, and I am sure we are not trying to avoid the payment of our debts, but it might be embarrassing to us to have to get evidence from our neighbors or our banks or other people that we are not trying to avoid the payment of our debts.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I do not think it would go to a strict legal proof. I think it will be sufficient to just satisfy the postmaster. These matters have to be handled as business propositions.

Mr. MANN. Meanwhile, while that person was being satisfied the registered package would be held up, and it might take a week or a month to find out.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. That is where I beg to differ with my colleague. The intention of this amendment and its practical operation would be that, if a man came into a community and wished his address concealed, it would be his duty to go and see the postmaster and make such an arrangement; and in trying to make that arrangement, if the postmaster was satisfied the reason he wanted to have his address concealed was that he wanted to avoid a debt, he would not grant that permission. Otherwise his mail would be delivered just as it is now, with the exception that the registry receipt would show where it was delivered.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman now to say that he thinks under this amendment if a man came into a community new, he must at once go to the postmaster and make his arrangements. That would be very difficult to do in a large city.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Until he went to the post office and gave his address the post office would not know where to find him; and, if he wanted to conceal his address, then he can also, at the same time that he is asking to have his mail delivered at a certain point, see his postmaster and inform him of the reason why he wants to have his address concealed, and the postmaster, being satisfied that that is not for the purpose of avoiding a debt, can have his address concealed, leaving the whole matter in the hands of the Post Office Department, just where it is now.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman, of course, looks at it from the point of view possibly, just at present, of a smaller town, although he does not represent a small town. But a man in the city does not go to the post office and leave his address. A man moves very frequently in large cities from one address to another. He leaves with the carrier an address to which to forward his mail from one place to another place. He does not go and make any arrangement about that; but under this provision a registered package could not be delivered to him at the place to which he had moved unless, according to the gentleman, he had gone and made an arrangement with the Post Office Department. I do not think that ought to go into the law, especially as to the payment of debts.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. As I suggested to my colleague, if he wishes to have it amended in the way suggested, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to continue the reservation of the point of order. I believe this is too important a provision to be incorporated in an appropriation bill without any prior consideration by a committee or without recommendation by the department, and, therefore, I will be constrained to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order, and the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I now renew the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order only to the amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. It simply went to the amendment. I had no idea of making the point of order on section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained as to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will reserve it for a minute.

Mr. MOON. Do you withdraw your point of order on the main section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was about to renew it in order to facilitate business.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman desires to discuss the amendment, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that that is too late. He can not reserve it. Business has intervened since.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the question recurs now to the original paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will permit——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania originally reserved the point of order. It was not proper to consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] while the point of order was reserved and pending. Therefore the gentleman from Minnesota was virtually proceeding under unanimous consent, and his proposition was never formally before the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has not waived his right of the reservation of a point of order to section 10, because he has never withdrawn it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdrew his point of order, and the RECORD will show that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have renewed it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman withdrew it, then the point of order comes too late.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order that it can not be renewed after it has been withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the RECORD shows that I withdrew it, Mr. Chairman, of course I am bound by it. I leave it to other gentlemen to make the point, if anyone desires to do so. Perhaps others may not have understood the situation, owing to the confusion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the paragraph is a very worthy provision.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion or point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw it—whatever motion I have made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have a brief explanation of what is proposed to be accomplished by this paragraph, section 10, about the precancellation of stamps with the name of the post office printed thereon.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, under the existing law the precancellation of postage stamps, that is, the printing on them between two horizontal lines of the name of the post office at which they are used, must be done under the supervision of the post office at which they are mailed.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that under the existing law, where these precanceled stamps are used, they have to be canceled under the supervision of the postmaster at the city?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And under this paragraph it is proposed that when they print the stamps at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the bureau shall cancel them by printing on them the name of the city?

Mr. MOON. I will read the department's statement on that point. I read:

Reason for such legislation: Under existing law the precancellation of postage stamps—that is, the printing on them between two horizontal lines of the name of the post office at which they are to be used—must be done under the supervision of the postmaster at such office. The larger offices precancel the stamps by means of electroplates on printing presses installed as part of their office equipment, while at other offices the stamps are precanceled under contract by private persons or concerns under the supervision of the postmaster or a postal employee. At smaller offices where the precancellation of the stamps in either of the ways mentioned is not warranted, hand stamps are used. The cost of precanceling the stamps under the present system varies considerably, and in some instances it is believed that it would be more economical to print the name of the post office on the stamps before furnishing them to the postmaster. House bill 4790 provides for this procedure.

The gentleman is right about his position.

Mr. MANN. This is to expedite it?

Mr. MOON. Yes; this is to expedite it.

Mr. MANN. This subject is rather curious as to its history. Some years ago we provided for the use of precanceled postage stamps in the delivery of mail. After it had been running a year or two, at the recommendation of the Post Office Department, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported a provision on the Post Office bill repealing that provision of the law. It would have gone out except that I made a point of order on it, because it was a change of existing law. I am glad now that the Post Office is endeavoring to expedite and cheapen the use of these precanceled stamps.

Mr. MOON. I think it is of advantage. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. If there is no discussion, I will make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I hope the gentleman will let this matter pass, unless he objects to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to explain the purpose of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I reserve the point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this provision has been carried frequently in the Post Office appropriation bill coming before the House. It is of benefit not only to the Postal Service but is fair to the railroads of the country, even if the present system of pay by weight is continued. It provides for the withdrawal of the mail bags during the heavy season, when they are most in use, from October 1 to April 1, from freight trains, and permits them to be carried in the mails, and compensates the railroads for that additional weight during that period.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman regards this as a meritorious paragraph that ought properly to go into the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no doubt about that. It is absolutely needed by the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is one of the meritorious provisions that ought to be considered by the Congress in the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. It has been considered by the House many times before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it subject to a point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think that these meritorious paragraphs ought to be sandwiched in an appropriation bill along with other paragraphs that are not meritorious, like those creating a surety department in the Post Office Department and that reducing the rate of railway mail pay?

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the gentleman I will say that I am not in favor at all of having riders placed on appropriation bills, as has been the practice of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for several years past. There is perhaps no other committee of the House that has so repeatedly violated the rule as to riders as has the Committee on Post Offices; and instead of doing as other committees have done when legislation is needed in the Postal Service, instead of introducing separate bills which could have been reached in the regular order on the calendar, they forego doing everything of that kind, and include all their legislative recommendations on the Post Office bill as riders, and when the bill is reported the committee adjourns sine die. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the result of this very offensive practice of attempting to enact legislation on an appropriation bill is that Members of this House are forced either to vote up or down meritorious propositions if they wish at the same time to defeat provisions that are not meritorious.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will concede that riders on appropriation bills can not receive the due consideration that should be given, and which would be given, to them if they were embodied in separate measures. The rules have for many years forbidden the incorporation of riders on appropriation bills, and yet this Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads offends, and continues to offend, with 57 varieties, each year by incorporating in the appropriation bill miscellaneous items which are subject to points of order instead of bringing the measures in separately as legislation, as they should be brought in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman concedes that riders are vicious?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Congress for years has forbidden that. It is a vicious practice. That is why it is provided in the rules that it shall not be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why should a Member be compelled to rise in his place and object to a meritorious provision that is subject to a point of order in order to defeat other provisions that ought to be defeated?

Mr. STAFFORD. There are provisions in this bill that are vicious, that are sought to be crammed through this House under a gag rule, without any consideration whatever. For instance, last year what opportunity was given to the House for a full consideration of the railway mail pay provision carried in the appropriation bill? The general debate was limited, and there was only 10 minutes' discussion under the five-minute rule, whereas if that provision had been brought in as a separate bill and ample time given for discussion and amendment, the Members of the House would have been only too willing to have given it serious consideration.

But here is a proposition to have this railway mail provision covering a great number of subjects, considered as one section. And the same is true with reference to the bond guaranty fund, an entirely new proposition, never before considered by the House, and to many other proposed changes of law in the bill. That is the condition that I protest against, because it is opposite to proper, deliberative, legislative consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When legislation is brought into the House in this way under a rule, what is the remedy for an individual Member of this House? Is it to vote it up or vote it down?

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, there is only one way to do, and that is to resent the autocracy of the Democratic majority of the Committee on Rules in jamming down our throats legislation that can not be considered under the orderly procedure of this House, when forced upon us in the form of riders on appropriation bills. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend from Wisconsin is unduly disturbed. This committee does not propose, nor has it ever proposed, to ram down the throats of this House any legislation on any subject. Nor does it propose to bring a rule here that will cut off the proper discussion of any question or prevent you from voting separately and amending as you may see fit any proposition in this bill. We hope that the House will vote for a rule that will make these sections in order, to be considered separately, but in such form that if approved by the House they may be made a part of the law of the land. We believe that these sections which we are offering here, which are technically out of order on this bill, ought to be made in order under a special rule, so that they may be passed for the benefit of the department and of the people of the United States. There is to be no pressure in any way, shape, or form.

We ask simply such a change of the rule as will make them in order on this bill. If you do not like them, vote them down. You will have ample opportunity to consider them and do with them just as you choose. I think I have never objected to one of these special rules, because I think the changing of a general rule is at times the proper way to get legislation. You know that you can not get the consideration of these administrative propositions by twenty-odd separate bills. You know that there would be no chance. There never has been a time in the history of this House when any postal legislation of any value, except perhaps the postal savings bank and one other proposition or two in the last 40 years, ever became the law except as a rider on an appropriation bill. You know you can not get these matters considered otherwise. Gentlemen might as well be candid. If they are against the proposition, of course, they will be against the rule to consider it. That is all right, but there can be no consideration of this legislation, there can be no possible chance to pass it, unless it is incorporated upon this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not possible to have a bill dropped into the basket and then referred in the regular way to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and have consideration there, and then bring it into the House and pass it?

Mr. MOON. Yes; it is possible to do that if you can ever reach it in the House for consideration; but whenever you do that, the experience of this body has been that that bill has died in a pigeonhole in the Senate, and in order to get the Senate to consider these questions—not you gentlemen, but the Senate—in order to get the Senate to give consideration to the judgment of this House it has been for 40 years the custom and the necessity, I may say, to incorporate these legislative provisions as riders on appropriation bills.

We have not asked for any gag rule, nothing of that kind. We just simply ask the temporary abrogation of a general rule that prohibits the consideration of legislation on an appropriation bill. That will leave the whole question open for the judgment and decision of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it possible to have the special rule passed without a vote of the House to do it?

Mr. MOON. Positively not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the trouble is in the Senate, would it not still be in the Senate, whether we pass this legislation in this way or not?

Mr. MOON. No; whenever you put this appropriation bill before the Senate with these riders on it, they are a part of the bill. They go there as a part of the bill, as the judgment of this House as to what the law should be, and the Senate is obliged to take cognizance of them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And vote it up or vote it down.

Mr. MOON. Of course; and that is proper.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the general merits of the discussion, will the gentleman consider this proposition: One paragraph here provides for the institution of a system of surety bonds to be controlled by the Government, involving a question of paternalism, which is in dispute throughout the country? Does not the gentleman think that a very important question like that, involving all that it does, should come before the House in a separate bill, in order that it may be fairly and generally discussed?

Mr. MOON. In reply to the gentleman I want to say that the same men, of the same minds, the same courage, and the same judgment, will pass upon the bill whether in separate form or whether in connection with this appropriation bill, and it is utterly immaterial, so far as the judgment of this House is concerned, which way it comes, because there is to be no attempt made to force you to do anything except that which you could do if it were a separate bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that debate must be limited under the rule, and it would not be so limited if the bill came up in the regular way.

Mr. MOON. I do not propose to ask for any unreasonable length of time for the consideration of any of these questions. The House can take such time as it wishes. I am not going into the merits of that bond question now, but I want to say to the gentleman that when he sees how this Government has been defrauded, and how it has been unable to protect itself under the present law, I believe that as an honest man he will support that proposition if we conclude to put it in the bill either now or in the next bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These are just the questions that it seems to me ought to be discussed in the House in the regular way.

Mr. MOON. We can do it in a regular way, if the discussion is made in order on this bill, just as well as on any other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course the question of railway mail pay is a question of national importance.

Mr. MOON. That has been discussed for 30 years, in every way, shape, and form, and if this House is not ready to act on that question now, it never will be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman must remember that this House is made up of many new Members, who have not heard the previous discussions. All of the previous discussions died with the Congresses in which they took place, and everything is taken up here ab initio.

Mr. MOON. Let me say to the gentleman that there has been a full and complete hearing before the committee for the full length of time desired by the railroads. There have been 16 hours general debate in this House, most of that time devoted to this very question; and if you want more time I will not object. Do not hide behind an objection to a rule. People who are for the railroad companies in the United States, for the maintenance of the present law, may just as well say so, and those who are for the protection of this Government against the wrongs it is suffering at the hands of these corporations would as well say so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is just one thing that I wish to say——

Mr. MOON. I mean no reflection upon the gentleman, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course not, and I am in no way questioning the integrity of the chairman of the committee. He will understand that, but any individual Member of this House must drop his bill into the basket and take his chances with the committee. If he has no great influence because of previous service in the House, his chances of consideration by the committee are not any too strong. It is a matter of time and experience and a matter of observation, a matter of acquaintanceship very largely, if the bill is to get proper consideration by the committee. But where a committee is powerful, as is this Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and great questions come before it involving the employment of men and the expenditure of vast sums of money, it does seem as if the House, particularly when there is a great body of new Members in the House, should have these questions brought before it for discussion, rather than to rely upon a general debate for 16 hours, or any other time, on any question the Member may see fit to discuss. There should be a specific discussion of a specific problem, which should be treated in a specific way.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will have that opportunity.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to interrupt at this point, I desire to say that there were 16 hours of debate and there was specific discussion of specific questions, and if the gentleman was not upon the floor or sufficiently interested to hear what was said upon the subject it is his fault and not the fault of anyone else.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was as much on the floor as any other Member during the general debate, which, it is generally understood, does not always apply to the bill under consideration. Members must sometimes escape during general debate to catch up with office work.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do make the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will give me some time.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman says that he is going to make the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think he will not, after I appeal to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph may be meritorious. I have no doubt it is; but it comes along with other paragraphs that will be subject to the rule, which in due course will come up to be voted upon by the House, and I shall feel it my duty to make the point of order; but, debate having ensued upon it at this time, if I may be permitted, I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I may be permitted to yield, I will do so; but if it is necessary to make the point of order I will make it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained and the Clerk will read.

SEC. 12. That the act of March 4, 1909 (ch. 321, sec. 198, 35 Stats., p. 1126), to be amended to read as follows:

"Whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending, as the Chair understands.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to obtain some information. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee his reason for omitting certain language from the present statute which provides punishment for all persons who attack letter carriers?

Mr. MOON. It is not necessary to put that in. We do not repeal that at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the chairman to the fact that by this section the gentleman is amending the existing section, chapter 321, section 138, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, "to read as follows:" If we adopt this language we repeal everything in the existing section that is left out. In the present section, as the gentleman well knows, there is a provision which penalizes all assailants of letter carriers, and I am inquiring of the committee whether there is anything in the hearings or anything in the report of the various assistants or the Postmaster General justifying the leaving out of that language?

Mr. MOON. I do not think it is left out. I think it is in the law of the land now. It is not in this proposed amendment. The gentleman will understand that this amendment, by operation of law, will incorporate itself with the general statute. It does not operate to repeal that statute, it is a mere amendment to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the gentleman knows that if there is no other provision of law, referring to the provision penalizing those who assault letter carriers, and we exclude it in this amendment, that therefore that provision fails.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman and I do not quite agree as to the construction of statutes. This is an amendment to a statute. It does not undertake to repeal that statute at all, but it incorporates itself into the body of the existing law, which retains the provision which the gentleman referred to. If this provided that it should be a repeal of that statute, the gentleman would be right, but it is not a repeal by direct act, nor is it a repeal by operation of law by implication, because this section is in no way inconsistent with the provision to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. STAFFORD. But here, by subsequent enactment, we embody more than half of the present phraseology of the existing statute, and leave out the latter part, providing for the punishment of those who attack letter carriers.

Mr. MOON. Well, that will be the law of the land when this is passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have to take issue with the gentleman's position. When we subsequently enact a section and provide that it shall read as follows, that the language supplants existing law and is a reincorporation of that section as provided in the amended bill.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; if there is anything left in the old law that is not inconsistent with the new law, then it stands, and the amendment embodies itself in the old or existing law in its construction.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the chairman is mistaken about that, when you amend a section to read as follows——

Mr. MOON. I may be mistaken in a great many things, but that is my opinion, and I give it for what it is worth.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then the gentleman does not consider if you omit any of the old words those words are repealed?

Mr. MOON. Oh, no.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is the doctrine of Sutherland on Statutory Construction, which I had occasion to examine the other day on the same question.

Mr. MOON. Doctors disagree and lawyers, too. I think where a statute only repeals a part of an existing statute and where the existing statutes are in no way inconsistent, both stand as the law of the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the gentleman is assuming to say that when you provide that the section shall read as follows and you insert new language that does not take the place of the old language?

Mr. MOON. To be amended as follows.

Mr. BRITT. The gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken in his interpretation of the amendment. It does not propose to supersede the existing law. It adds a separate and distinct amendment, and does not, either by specification or by implication, repeal the language which relates entirely to a different matter, and therefore the law remains.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this phraseology incorporated in this amendment pertains to the same matter as incorporated in the original section, other than the one matter, that is, as to assaults on letter carriers.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question? Does the gentleman want to incorporate into the new law part of the old law?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we should, unless there is some other law to cover that, because I am quite certain——

Mr. MOON. I think there is no necessity for it as a matter of law, but if the gentleman thinks otherwise, in order to be doubly sure I am not going to object to an amendment of that sort, although we think we might as well legislate on it in the proper manner.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether the intention is to leave that provision out?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain what is the real purpose accomplished by this amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. The purpose of the amendment is to punish anybody who maliciously destroys or despoils a letter box, or mail deposited in a letter box, or any receptacle which has to do with the holding of mail. It is clear upon its face what it means.

Mr. STAFFORD. Existing law provides that.

Mr. MADDEN. This adds to the penalty——

Mr. STAFFORD. In what respect?

Mr. MADDEN. Provided in the former law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon; the penalty is just the same as in the present law.

Mr. MADDEN. Read the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean the original law? I would be glad to read the present law for the gentleman's information.

Mr. MADDEN. Read it for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read it myself. The gentleman apparently seems not to have read the law; perhaps he has.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will state the point in the whole matter. When a man breaks a letter box or defaces it, whether it is in an unusual place on a route or not when he is brought to trial he will have to prove that the letter box was established there by authority of the Postmaster General. This section will obviate that necessity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly explain that point again? My attention was for the moment diverted.

Mr. MOON. I will read the gentleman, if he will listen carefully, what the department says on this subject:

Owing to the isolated position of the mail boxes used in the rural delivery and in the star service and to the fact that the official character of these receptacles is not generally recognized, depredations thereon are not unusual, and section 198 of the Criminal Code does not adequately meet the situation. If in the trial of persons charged with injuring or destroying mail boxes on mail routes the necessity for establishing the fact that the Postmaster General has approved such boxes were removed, the law would be much more efficacious. The security of the mails demands that these conditions be remedied, and, as a means of providing the required remedy—

This is contained in a letter from the Postmaster General.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to again advert to the question of the rule except to obtain information; but a copy of the proposed rule has come into my possession, and in connection with having it here I should like to ask the gentleman whether under the rule there will be opportunity to amend any of these paragraphs?

Mr. MOON. There will be an opportunity to amend every single word in the whole act, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then such a question might arise under the rule; that is, if a paragraph be found faulty it may be amended?

Mr. MOON. Of course. Does the gentleman think the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads wants legislation faulty or legislation unfair to anyone?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked the question because I have the resolution from the Committee on Rules, which reads:

Resolved, That after the adoption of this rule it shall be in order in the further consideration of H. R. 10484, a bill making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, to consider all the new legislation in each and all of the sections of said bill which have been stricken out on points of order, notwithstanding the rules of the House.

Now, that rule is to be understood as including the right of amendment as the discussion proceeds under the rule?

Mr. MOON. I say to the gentleman that I never have and never would vote for a rule that would preclude the right of amendment on this floor.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like to ask a question. Suppose you are in favor of one provision contained in the rule and are against another provision. Is there any way in which you can vote in favor of the one you want and against the other? Is there any way of dividing the rule?

Mr. MOON. There is no way of dividing the rule, but there is a way of dividing the question when you come to consider it in the House. You consider them all separately. The House has the power to do anything it wants to. The House can take a rule and amend it in any way it sees fit, can strike anything from it it wants to strike from it, or add to it anything it wants to add to it; and when you come to consider the bill each section will be considered separately, and you can vote as you choose as to them; and if you are not satisfied, a person in position under the rules to do so can, under the rules, move to recommit with instructions.

Mr. LINTHICUM. You would not be compelled to vote against the entire rule in order to eliminate certain things you were against?

Mr. MOON. I do not know what the committee will do, but I presume they will present a rule to cover all questions. Now, it will be with the Committee on Rules as to how they will present that question. I would take it that you would have the right to move to strike any provision from the rule that you wanted to strike from it. In other words, the House has the power to control this matter and do just as it chooses. Of course, I can not say what it will do.

Mr. MADDEN. You can vote yea or nay under the rule on these mooted paragraphs. Of course, you will have to vote yea or nay on the rule—on everything—but, if the rule passes, then you will be able, according to the explanation of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], to discuss that paragraph.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I might not want the rule to pass to consider one proposition, but might want it to pass to consider another one.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, that proposition would be considered in the House on its merits.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not want to be put in a position of voting for a rule on the very thing I am against.

Mr. MADDEN. Then vote against it.

Mr. MOON. There are a great many things in every bill that every Member of the House would not like to vote for, but after they have all been agreed upon and presented for a vote, it is very hard to get them separated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order and offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 5, after the word "receptacle," insert the following:
"Or shall willfully and maliciously assault any letter or mail carrier, knowing him to be such, while engaged on his route in the discharge of his duty, and such carrier"——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the committee and the chairman——

Mr. MOON. I do not think it is necessary to do it. I do not object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Some strictures have been made upon the action of the Post Office Committee for reporting so many legislative provisions upon an appropriation bill. Now, I have always opposed riders upon appropriation bills, as a rule, and I would say for the members of the committee that a minority of them, at least, were opposed to making some of these riders, like the railroad pay and insurance provisions; but as to the provisions like the one under consideration and the one preceding, which was struck out on the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], the committee was unanimous that that provision was to expedite the mail. During the holiday period there is great congestion in the mail, and if the mail sacks are to be sent back by freight instead of going into the regular mail trains it will delay the shipment of the holiday goods. And there can be no possible objection to it. The committee carefully considered both that and the provision now under consideration, and reported it now and at a former session, if not at two former sessions.

As to the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that by mixing up meritorious and uncontentious matters with these contentious matters, like insurance and railway questions, they are forced to vote on the whole thing en bloc. I wish to say if the gentleman would exercise a little discrimination and consider the acts of the Post Office Committee as amounting to something he would not object to these provisions, as they are simply in the interest of more efficient postal service. Then the position he would be in would be stronger, because by leaving these provisions in the bill, the provisions to which he does object and which he has mentioned, would remain there and stand on their own merits. They would not be bolstered up by meritorious matters. So that the argument he made in that direction is against himself, because the more meritorious matters go out on the point of order the stronger will be the provision covered by the rule making them in order. Therefore no gentleman should object to these innocuous provisions, if I may so call them, which the committee has reported and upon which it is unanimous. These are administrative matters that the committee has considered carefully and heard department officers upon, and they are unanimous in recommending their adoption. For that reason I think that the course pursued by the gentleman is a mistake and against his own interest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, of course I appreciate very much the agreeable lecture I have received from my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], who is naturally proud of the good portion of the work done by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. But I think I am within my rights in suggesting to him, as I did to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], that there is a fair way of bringing in this serious legislation. If it is as meritorious as the gentleman from Minnesota indicates it is, why does not the gentleman from Mnnesota or any other one of the minority of that committee introduce a bill in the regular way and have it referred to the committee and brought in on the floor of the House in the regular way, so that it can be discussed regularly by the Members here? If these ends were all meritorious, there would be no difficulty in advancing them in the House. Why must they always sandwich these meritorious provisions in with the nefarious projects if gentlemen really object to provisions that are not proper? [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman was here a year ago when these same provisions were in the bill, and he made no points of order against them. Why did we not have the right to believe that they were then satisfactory to him?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry that the gentleman from Minnesota has to hark back to the consideration of a bill a year ago for a citation as against me. I was just as much opposed to the Government going into the surety-bond business then as I am now. I was just as much opposed to ill-considered railway mail pay legislation then as I am now. I think that all proposed legislation involving the railroads, big and little—particularly little ones, that may be driven out of business by this provision—ought to be brought deliberately before the House and considered by the Members of the House from all sections of the country, without regard to the feelings of members of the minority or of the majority, who sit in chambers and perfect their work and then suddenly dump new provisions on the House and tell us to vote them up or vote them down.

The gentleman ought not to come here with a police force behind him, labeled "rule," and enforce this gag upon us. Up to this time I have not criticized the minority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. They have done a great deal of admirable work, but they know just as well as I know, or every other Member ought to know, that there is a legitimate way of bringing things in here. They ought not to be forced through by a gag rule, but should be put in in a regular way, as every one of us has to do who has a little bill which he desires to have passed. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very unbecoming in the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to set himself up as a critic on everybody in the House, and for one, as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I do not propose to submit to any such criticism as he imposes. [Applause.]

I think the Members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are just as honest, just as conscientious, and just as interested in the public welfare as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.] When he comes before this body and says there is no opportunity for the consideration of measures reported in this bill he says that which is not true. How would he get a measure before the House for consideration? Would he bring it in himself and dump it on the floor and say, "Here it is; consider it"? Or would he give it consideration by a committee? Would he investigate a question of great importance through a committee of the House?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the measures he opposes have been given consideration before the House in a regular way, and when a rule is adopted, if it shall be adopted, these measures will be before the House for proper consideration; and if the gentleman had been in the House, as he ought to have been, when this question was being discussed he would know something about it. He knows nothing whatever about the thing now. [Applause.] I am in very much doubt whether he will know very much about it when we get through with the discussion that is to follow. [Laughter.] But I am opposed now and always to any one man arrogating to himself the right to become the critic of everyone else.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to know that he has taken more time on the floor of this House to talk about nothing than any other man in the House. [Laughter.] And if he thinks that he is popularizing himself by filling the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with a lot of stuff that has nothing whatever to do with the questions pending before the House, he is greatly mistaken. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves a point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And, Mr. Chairman, in reserving the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. All pro forma amendments are withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in reserving the point or order, I acknowledge with deep appreciation the strictures that have been imposed upon me by a second member of the minority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MADDEN. You brought it on yourself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am delighted with it. [Laughter.] The gentleman has complimented me by the assertions he has made. When it comes to consuming the time of the House and lecturing fellow Members, the gentleman from Illinois is a past master, and I regard it as a bit of advice from "Sir Hubert" when the gentleman from Illinois refers to me. I do not expect much applause for the compliment I am now paying to the gentleman from Illinois because of the situation that has suddenly arisen. The gentleman was agitated, possibly angered, in the statement he made; but he caused me no ill feeling, for I knew that down in the depths of his heart he had the warmest personal affection for me, as I have for him. [Applause.]

But in the time I have I will now ask the gentleman from Illinois, who has made these personal observations with respect to his colleague from Pennsylvania, whether any Member of this House or any member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in particular, has ever taken the time to drop a bill into that basket pertaining to railway mail pay? If he does not answer that question—and I give him the time to do it—then I make the deliberate statement——

Mr. MADDEN. Just a moment; I will answer the question. I wish to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in reply to his question, that it was not necessary to drop a bill into the basket in regard to the railway mail pay, because a more comprehensive plan had been adopted and approved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where and when, I will ask?

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman. This House, by an almost unanimous vote, authorized and directed the appointment of a joint railway mail pay commission. That commission sat for two years. They heard every railroad man in the United States. They heard anybody who had any question to raise about how the railroads should be paid for moving the mails. They made a report, and that report was referred to the committee. That committee reported to this House, and the House adopted what they did. The bill containing that proposition went to the Senate.

The bill came back from the Senate with that proposition not approved. Then it went to conference. The conferees reported a compromise. That compromise was reported back to the House. This House approved the compromise, and the last hours of the session having come to hand, the Senate had not time to approve it. Then we took up the question at the beginning of this Congress again, and we invited every railroad company in the United States to come before the committee for hearing. Two hundred and twenty-seven thousand out of two hundred and fifty thousand miles of railroad in the United States were represented there by counsel and by their presidents. They had every opportunity to present every phase of their side of the case. They presented it. We have given three years of considerate deliberation to this question, and we pretend to say that we have given intelligent consideration to it, and we do not think it is necessary to go through the perfunctory performance of dropping a bill into the box, after such consideration as this. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made a plea of confession and avoidance.

Mr. MADDEN. No, he has not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He has admitted that the committee originated this legislation, and that it has not been before the Members of this House at all.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. MOON. I want to say that when the matter was heard before the committee, when the railroads of the United States had a full hearing by their officers and counsel, there was before them in printed form the bill as it now appears before you, and that is the bill to which their attention was invited, and that is the matter that was discussed before the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement. I wish to repeat what I have said several times during this discussion, that every Member of this House, exercising his prerogative as a Member, desiring to originate business here and have it properly considered, prepares a bill and puts it in that basket for reference to a committee. That is the equality of membership in this House which we are all supposed to observe; but in this instance, as it now develops—and I did not bring on this phase of the discussion—a commission is ruling this House; we are told it was not necessary for it to drop its work in that basket. The commission submitted its report to a committee, the committee originated the business, and then the committee comes in with an appropriation bill introducing this new and important matter of legislation and prepares to support its action by a gag rule, by which it expects to force down the throats of the Members of this House the legislation that it did not dare to bring in in the regular way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is very unfortunate. This is an appropriation bill, and nearly all of the items are considered exactly as this one was. He is unfortunate further in this: The railroad companies had a copy of this bill, and they have been protesting against it for 12 months, the identical bill that is reported here. They have not made any complaint of lack of notice. They knew all about it. Every Member of this House knew it, and we made up the bill in the ordinary way in which we make up all appropriation bills, not by putting it in the basket——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that every morning in the mail of every Member of this House there comes so much literature pertaining to legislation in the House that it is not possible for any Member—with the single exception, of course, of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—to read it all? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MOON. My business has not been so big that I could not attend to it every day by using all the time each day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that Members of this House, old and new, are so engrossed with their business every day, from the waking hour until Congress closes, that they have not time to attend upon every committee meeting, where the hearings are prolonged and going on from week to week? And is it not true that they do not have the physical make-up to read all the testimony adduced at these hearings, and is it not true that they must rely to a large extent upon the reports of committees in matters of this kind?

Mr. MOON. It is unquestionably true that you have got to rely largely upon the reports of committees, and when a committee gives you a report and produces the printed reports of the hearings that have been going on for years, you ought to be willing to proceed with the consideration of the matter that the committee presents, and not complain that you have not been able to look into it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will give the gentleman some information on the question of railway-mail pay, and I hand it to the gentleman now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have this information which has been handed to me, and to say that it consists of about 1,000 printed pages of testimony, taken during the course of weeks of hearings, and that we receive this kind of evidence every day from various committees of this House, making it physically impossible for one Member to read it all.

Mr. MOON. That means that you would not do anything in this House unless Mr. MOORE had personally considered the matter before. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I am obliged for these various personal equations, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania read all the bills that go into the basket?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I undertake to keep track of the bills as they are reported, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. There are 33,000 bills introduced at every session of Congress. I think the gentleman must be kept pretty busy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman still insist that business ought to originate in committees and not in the regular way through the basket, which is the only avenue open to the average Member of the House?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the question of railway mail pay was discussed in the annual report of the Post Office Department and that substantially these recommendations were made in that report?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know it has been discussed in very many ways, but it is not fairly discussed when it is brought in here under a gag rule.

Mr. MOON. There is no gag rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, what is the parliamentary status?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The reservation of the point of order is still pending?

Mr. MOON. I will ask the gentleman if he is going to make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] having stated that this is a meritorious paragraph, I will not make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have the warmest regard for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I esteem him highly. In fact, I am very fond of him. I have known him for quite a while, and I always listen to his speeches here on the floor with a great deal of interest. But I assume there is one thing with which he is not very familiar, and that is postal legislation. The gentleman from Pennsylvania evidently does not know that 99 per cent of all postal legislation for many years past has been brought in as riders on Post Office appropriation bills.

The gentleman forgets that, and while, as I stated, I have always listened to his speeches with a great deal of interest, and have in this instance and during this session to his numerous arguments, yet I am forced to one conclusion, and that is that while he may be up on every other subject that comes before the House, on postal matters he is absolutely wanting in information. Evidently he knows nothing about them. Awhile ago he struck out the provision, on a point of order, that was intended to help great offices like that at New York and Philadelphia to expedite the business in those offices. Of course he did not know that, but that provision with reference to precancellation of stamps would not apply to small offices, it could not be applied to them, but it would be a workable and economic proposition in a great office like that at Philadelphia. I can only say this, that judging by the gentleman's——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I did that, as I explained at the time, knowing that they were meritorious paragraphs, with a view to facilitating the business. I was simply hastening the time when the rule would come in, and all these things would be forced back upon the House under the gag system. That is all.

Mr. FINLEY. But the gentleman has taken up even more time since he made that point of order than he did before, so I do not believe that he has expedited anything in the way of passing this bill. In fact, after listening to the gentleman's speeches and colloquies with reference to the Post Office bill I am reminded of a story which my good friend Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY told me. He said that on one occasion a friend of his was making a speech, a great speech, as he thought. He came down into the audience and asked a gentleman in the audience what he thought of the speech. The gentleman replied that it was a great speech, an eloquent speech, and a fine speech, but that there were two objections to it; that in the first place, "You talked too loud, and in the second place you didn't know what you were talking about." [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the following be added as a proviso to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes":

"Provided, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages, effective from January 1, 1914, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that he offer an amendment to section 13 to so amend it as to strike out the language:

That the following be added as a proviso to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes":

"Provided."

And also strike out the quotation marks at the end of the section.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the language which the gentleman desires stricken out was inadvertently placed in the bill. The amendment is a proper one, and I move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 34, by striking out after "SEC. 13," line 9, the remainder of line 9, and the language in line 10 and the word "Provided" in line 11, and strike out the quotation marks at the end of line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Section 13 reads:

That the following be added as a proviso to the item: "Inland transportation by railroad routes."

To what does that refer?

Mr. MOON. There is an item back in the bill which provides for pay to railroads for inland transportation of mail, and the language here was a recommendation that this section be placed under that provision, though put in the form of a separate section.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the following provision of law be inserted in the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, as part of the item "For inland transportation by railroad routes":

"Provided, That when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territories, commencing about March 25, 1913."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, after the words "SEC. 15," on line 4, page 35, the balance of line 4 and all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and the word "Provided," on line 10, and the quotation marks at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 35, by striking out, after "SEC. 15," the remainder of line 4, and all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and the word "Provided," in line 10, and the quotation marks at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the following proviso be added to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes" in the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917:

"Provided further, That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon the limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out——

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Is the gentleman going to make the point of order?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee a question. This seems to be a very unusual construction:

That the following proviso be added to the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes" in the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, that is the part that I was going to move to strike out.

Mr. BENNET. The part that I have just read?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out after "SEC. 16," in line 13, page 36, the remainder of line 13, and all of lines 14, 15, 16, and the words "Provided further," in line 17, and the quotation marks at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 36, by striking out after "SEC. 16," on page 36, the remainder of line 13, and lines 14, 15, and 16, and the words "Provided further," in line 17, and the quotation marks at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the chairman of the committee would kindly inform the committee as to the respective amounts the railroads will receive under this item and under the item which was agreed to in section 13, resulting from increasing the weight of parcel-post packages by the respective orders referred to.

Mr. MOON. The department says about this item:

Should this suggested provision become a law the additional expenditure which would be incurred thereby for the fiscal year 1914 would be $221,935.45; for the fiscal year 1915, $168,021.68; for the fiscal year 1916, $84,249.52; and for the fiscal year 1917 it would be necessary to add $55,468.85 to the amount of the estimates submitted by the department on the present basis for the item "Inland transportation by railroad routes."

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the additional compensation the railroads will receive by reason of the increase of weight of parcel-post packages as provided under section 13?

Mr. MOON. I will not be able to advise the gentleman as to the amount there, because it does not appear here in the record.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask the chairman a question. This is limited to one-half of 1 per cent, that is the extra allowance for the increased weight of mails by reason of the Executive order increasing the weight limit of parcel post, and in the other section, section 13, it is limited to 1 per cent, I think. Now, it appeared in the testimony on the question of railway mail pay that some of the short-line railroads had had not only an increase of 100 per cent but some two or three hundred per cent, and I think I asked some questions whether this would not enable the department to pay them, and it appears they are not able to pay them an adequate sum because it is limited to a very small fraction of the pay they already receive. Now, I understood Gen. Steuart to say when interrogated about this matter that he was of the opinion that this would be sufficient as a general allowance for all the railroads in the country. It would increase the pay for carrying mails one-half of 1 per cent by reason of the increase of the weight limit of the parcel post referred to in that section, but the increase has been so different in different sections of the country; for instance, there is one railroad in California, running, I believe, from San Francisco to Shasta, where the amount of parcels had increased the volume of the mail more than 100 per cent, so that they had to put on freight cars and extra engines. This small increase over what they did receive would not compensate them, and my inquiry of the chairman is whether or not the limit should not be stricken off in order to do justice to all these carriers.

Mr. MOON. Well, I doubt that, and think we had better fix a limit, and this illustrates the inadequacy of the present law on the subject of compensation to roads for the services rendered. Here is a general law, under which it is impossible to give these roads any compensation for this service. Now, we have tried to remedy that in the seventeenth section by making provision by which there can be a special contract and adequate pay given for the carriage of mail over any road. The Postmaster General under existing law can not do that except in a general way, when unusual conditions exist.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is retroactive, and the provision the gentleman refers to covers the future, and it is very good.

Mr. MOON. If we had had such a law heretofore, we would not have been put to the trouble of guessing at the amount that would be due.

Mr. STEENERSON. But could not the department have had a weighing made, so as to have determined what the increase should be by reason of the increase in the weight limit of parcel post here referred to?

Mr. MOON. Well, I suppose that might have been done, but probably with the result that it would cost as much as the parcels themselves, or a great part of them——

Mr. STEENERSON. No; it would have resulted in paying exactly what it was, instead of claims being made all over the country that they are being defrauded.

Mr. MOON. That would be true of the aggregate mail routes and not of individual cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from and after the 1st day of July, 1916, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, and closed-pouch service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think sufficient of this item has been read in order to make the point of order on the section, and I therefore make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order as well taken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order against the entire section.

Mr. MOON. I concede it is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, one moment, if the gentleman pleases. I desire to ask if the last paragraph on page 49 is intended to be a part of this section 17?

Mr. MOON. That goes with the section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A part of section 17?

Mr. MOON. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RECESS.

Mr. MANN. Let us adjourn, as we have nothing else to do, apparently.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us consider the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Are we going to the Private Calendar; is that what the gentleman is waiting for?

Mr. MOON. To be frank with the gentleman, we are waiting to get the rule in order to bring it in.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was ready for the last two weeks.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to make a motion to take a recess until the gentleman from Tennessee has prepared the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be in order.

Mr. MANN. Why not? A motion to take a recess is in order at any time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for 10 minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I second the motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion to take a recess is not a privileged motion.

Mr. MANN. No one claimed it was. It was made; it is before the House, and it is in order.

Mr. BORLAND. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill will be here in a few minutes, as soon as the Clerk can prepare it, and I move a recess for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand.

Mr. BORLAND. I say that the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], is not here, and I move a recess for 10 minutes. I think he is ready to take up his bill.

Mr. MANN. No one is ever here when he is needed. No gentleman made a motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a motion to take a recess. That is in order unless some one raises a question about it. No one has done so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] moves that the House take a recess for 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

A division being demanded by several Members, the House divided.

The question was again taken; and there were—ayes 45, noes 5.

Mr. MANN. It shows how competent they are to do business. There is plenty of business on the calendar, and they do not know enough to get at it.

So the motion to take a recess was agreed to.

Accordingly the House (at 2 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) stood in recess for 10 minutes.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to see if we can not arrange for some time for general debate.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, there have been quite a number of requests for time on this side of the House. I think it was hardly anticipated that the bill would come up to-day. But there have been a good many requests for time, and some for considerable time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How much time does the gentleman think he ought to have on that side?

Mr. GOOD. I think perhaps four hours.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Do you mean four hours to a side or four hours in all?

Mr. GOOD. Four hours to this side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have no requests for time on this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. I should not think you would want to talk over there.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Can not the gentleman get along with two hours, so as to allow four hours for general debate on both sides?

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have three requests for an hour each.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let us make it three hours on a side.

Mr. GOOD. Well, I think perhaps I can cut down the requests on this side so that the speeches can be made in that time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion, I wish to ask unanimous consent that debate upon the pending bill be limited to six hours, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and three hours by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, pending his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to six hours, three hours to be controlled by himself and three hours by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill was not reported until the closing hours of last night. I understand it has some very startling propositions in it, and the House has not had an opportunity to read it or see it, and I think it ought to be heard now. So I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I have been undertaking to follow the Clerk, but I think he has overlooked two lines on page 16, under the head of the "Office of the Doorkeeper." It seems to me that I did not hear one or two lines in this paragraph read. I request that the Clerk begin on line 21, page 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. I ask that the bill be read in full. The Clerk seems to be reading it to himself. He can not be heard. I insist on the full reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman is right. The gentleman can assume that the bill is being read in full. The Chair will instruct the Clerk to read the bill in full.

Mr. MANN. That is what the Clerk should do, without being specially instructed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MANN. I am not out of order, Mr. Chairman. I have the right to advise the Chair that the Clerk is not reading the bill in full.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said that the gentleman from Illinois was right, and instructed the Clerk to read the bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this point that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a very important bill, Mr. Chairman, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not delay the public business.

Mr. MANN. I am not delaying the public business. The bill has only been in print a short time, and it was not available for the examination of Members until a few minutes ago. To insist that there should be no chance to hear the bill read is a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All the bills that are so considered are considered in a ridiculous way, if that is true.

Mr. MANN. Most of the bills that are considered by that side of the House are ridiculous.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will be responsible for the delay if we are here all summer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that portion of the bill which I particularly desired to hear having been read for my edification, I shall not resist the request of the gentleman to dispense with the reading of the balance of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House general debate of a pending measure is limited to six hours, three hours to be under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and three hours under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have read in my time the following editorials.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk reads as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 25, 1916.]

"THE PRESIDENT SPEAKS FOR THE NATION.

"No nobler deliverance by tongue or pen has come from the President, none more faithfully expressing the thought and will of the people of the United States, than his letter to Senator STONE. It is an utterance of encouragement and reassurance. It makes us certain that the honor of the country is to be resolutely upheld; it gives reason for confidence that peace will be maintained. We shall remain at peace, our relations of friendship with all foreign countries will continue, if President Wilson can compass this end. But honor is uppermost in heart and thought of every true American. We do not covet peace at the cost of honor, of right, and of our place in the respect of nations.

"It is a deep note and a grave one the President sounds, but it rings true. It will be of priceless service as a uniting adjuration to the people, and it will put faith and confidence into the hearts of those who have doubted or feared. Let us hope that the Missouri Senator and chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate will be inspired with a new fervor of patriotism, with a sure conviction that the honor and dignity of the Nation and the rights of Americans stand first of all and above all in the category of things that we must defend and preserve.

"Congress should respond to the President in the manly and patriotic spirit of his letter. The danger of attempting to embarrass the President in his conduct of the foreign relations of the United States has already been forcibly impressed upon the minds of its readers. They should resolve to repress and restrain such efforts, plots, and conspiracies, and give the President absolute assurances to that effect.

"Party politics cease at the frontier we have always been told. It is as a Nation that we have relations with foreign countries. The sound and venerable maxim is repudiated by some Democrats at Washington, by other Democrats not at Washington but having influence there. Personal politics, mean and malignant in origin, politics born of ignorance and zealotry, and politics alien to American interests have thrust themselves forward of late at the Capital; they have been the moving force of the conspiracy against the President. It is an unspeakably base thing, it is despicable beyond the power of denunciation that would be at once fitting and parliamentary to begin and carry on against the President a warfare based on such motives. Woodrow Wilson should have the help and support, not the hostility, of his countrymen, of all true Americans. He is in a position of extraordinary difficulty and responsibility. Criticism is free to all, but at a time when he is seeking to maintain the dignity and honor of the Nation and the rights of its citizens it should be helpful and sympathetic, not factional, partisan, and obstructive.

"The Republicans in Congress are better disposed toward him than the Democrats. They, at least, seem to put the feeling and the consciousness of nationality above the petty concerns of party. It is the Democrats who are divided; some of them are hostile to the President altogether. They expose themselves to the suspicion of seeking to compass his downfall, even though the accomplishment of their ends would involve peril and discredit for the Nation. President Wilson, with loyal support, will guide the country through the difficulties that beset him. He will carry his party through the campaign to triumph in the November election if his party will let him do it. In the Democratic Congress lies the peril to the Democratic Party."

[From the New York World, Feb. 25, 1916.]

"GERMANY IN CONGRESS.

"Does the Congress of the United States purpose to cancel the solemn pledge that Germany has made to the Government of the United States and relieve Germany of all obligation to keep faith with this country?

"That is the only question involved in the so-called 'revolt' of certain Members of Congress against the President's foreign policy.

"After the sinking of the Arabic the German Ambassador, acting under instructions from the German foreign office, gave the following pledge to the State Department:

"Liners will not be sunk by our submarines without warning and without safety of the lives of the passengers, provided the liners do not try to escape or offer resistance.

"This pledge was not restricted to unarmed liners. It applied to all liners that did not try to escape or offer resistance.

"In its new submarine order the German Government has attempted to tear up this promise. It threatens to treat all armed merchantmen as warships, whether they offer resistance or not, meaning that they will be sunk without warning and without provision for the safety of passengers. Naturally enough, the President has refused to acquiesce in Germany's action. As he says in his letter to Senator STONE, he can not believe the central powers mean what they appear to say, that whether so or not 'our duty is clear,' and the President makes it clear he will not be budged from that course of duty.

"This controversy has nothing to do with Secretary Lansing's effort to bring the belligerents into agreement in regard to a submarine code. That is a matter for negotiation. Whatever the opinion of the United States Government may be as to the desirability as a permanent maritime policy of disarming all merchant ships, we can not recognize Germany's right to tear up her guaranties to the United States before a uniform rule is agreed to by all the principal belligerents.

"That is the whole case in a nutshell. It is impossible to escape the conviction that the new German submarine order is a deliberate attempt to trick the United States and to repudiate a solemn promise which Germany made in September in order to avert war with this country.

"Should Congress overrule the President in this matter, Americans would have no rights that any belligerent was bound to respect. If one pledge could be torn up at the will of Germany, all pledges that hamper belligerents could be torn up by any country that believed it would profit thereby."

[Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman used eight minutes and yields back two minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of military training in the public schools and on the general subject of the national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL].

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Chairman, I did not think this bill would be brought into the House so unexpectedly. The consideration of it was to have been deferred until after the Post Office bill had been disposed of. There is, however, a provision in it which should be carefully considered and discussed in the general debate in order that the Members of the House may understand it thoroughly before the whole measure is taken up section by section. I refer to the clause which extends the hours of labor for clerks in the departments in Washington. I think a little consideration of the matter will bring us irresistibly to the conclusion that the provision making the working day eight hours instead of seven, as fixed by present law, is unwise and should not have been included in the bill. Since it has been included, the next best thing to do is to eliminate it by adverse vote when the bill is being considered section by section.

It is true that the clerks of the departments in Washington work seven hours and that other classes of Government employees work eight hours a day. We must, however, remember that these men who work seven hours are engaged in performing duties which are confining and which require intense application. Consider that these men are continually under the eyes of Congress. They are alert and industrious and are constantly at the call of the Members of the House and Senate. They put in seven hours of solid, faithful, and conscientious labor.

Moreover, the clerks have a certain amount of work to do and they continue at it until it is finished. Sometimes they work more than seven hours a day. I have heard that during the Mexican trouble the clerks in the War and Navy Departments were engaged day and night in discharging each day's duties, and they worked cheerfully and effectively. This provision is not a progressive step. It is a step of retrogression. In private business the tendency has been to shorten hours of labor and to increase wages. The Government now proposes to lengthen the hours of labor and, except in some instances, to leave wages stationary. The compensation the clerks now receive was fixed in 1857, and although private employers have increased their pay schedules to enable the employees to cope with the high cost of living, the Government has in this respect done practically nothing. The Government should set the example of ameliorating the condition of the workmen rather than that of making it more burdensome. There is another idea I would like to inject into this discussion. It is the question of pensions. The departments to-day are filled with faithful men, many of whom have reached the period of superannuation. These men ought to be pensioned, and this civil-service retirement pension should have been enacted years ago. You will find, as a matter of fact, that this provision, if it were to go into operation, would make the administration of the Government more difficult.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILL. With pleasure.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is very much interested in a civil-service retirement bill, because he has introduced one. Now, does he think he is aiding the accomplishment of that purpose by insisting upon a larger number of men doing a smaller day's work; or would not he be aiding his retirement proposition for his civil-service employees throughout the country by insisting upon a smaller number of men doing a full day's work and having a smaller number of employees to deal with?

Mr. HAMILL. In other words, the gentleman's proposition is simply this: He thinks that by making the plight of the clerks positively unbearable, Congress might be moved to grant them a pension. I believe they should receive a pension, but this benefit ought to be accelerated by fairer means than this.

Gentlemen, this proposition will work injury to the business men of the Capital. We ought to take the business community into consideration, because the people of Washington are in a special way committed to the care of Congress. They have no representatives on this floor. They have merely the right to petition Congress. We ought not therefore, without good reason, contemplate passing an act which will work havoc among the merchants. And there is no good reason for this legislation. No department heads have called for it or recommended it. It is contrary to the spirit of the times, which tends to make the working day shorter. It is unjust and unnecessary. It is our plain duty to decisively defeat it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, numerous criticisms have been leveled recently at the Democratic administration from partisan sources on the ground that its platform pledges of economy and efficiency in the public service have not been observed. As a proof of these charges the partisan critics have pointed to the fact that the gross amounts of appropriations for public purposes made by Congresses under Democratic control have been larger than the aggregate of appropriations of previous Congresses under Republican control. From this simple comparison of totals it has been argued that not only has the Democratic Party been extravagant in the conduct of affairs, but also it has acted in bad faith in violating its pledges to the American people. While this method of comparison between the total appropriations of different Congresses appears on its face to substantiate the charges of the partisan critics, it is in fact the most unreliable, false, and superficial method that can possibly be imagined.

I have served on the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives during the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses and now during the present Sixty-fourth Congress. The Sixty-second Congress had a Democratic majority in the House of Representatives and a Republican Senate and President. The Sixty-third Congress was wholly under Democratic control, and so is the present Congress. Our critics therefore always begin with the Sixty-second Congress, or the one with the first Democratic majority in the House of Representatives. As showing the utter unreliability of the comparison of the total appropriations of different Congresses, it need only be said that this great country of ours is continually growing; its population is steadily increasing; its wealth is multiplying; and its interests, both foreign and domestic, are broadening. It should occur to our critics therefore at the very outset to ascertain whether the growth of appropriations is larger than the normal growth of the business and population of the country. If it be no larger, then there certainly is no extravagance as compared with Republican rule although there may be no retrenchment.

An examination of the laws enacted in the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses will disclose that the normal activities of the Federal Government grew steadily, bringing with them the corresponding growth in the fixed charges upon the Federal Treasury. Additional terms of the United States courts were created at various places to accommodate the public business. Public buildings were erected, completed, and occupied in various portions of the United States requiring expenditures for heat, light, janitor service, and maintenance. Various ports and subports of entry were created in the interest of commerce. Additional boats were purchased for the Customs Service and for the Lighthouse, Life-Saving, and Steamboat-Inspection Services. A large number of new lighthouses and other aids to navigation were established along the coasts and harbors. More and better life-saving stations were erected and equipped. New revenue cutters were built and put into service. These may be classed as the normal and regular growth of the expenses of the Government, which must be met by any party in power, unless it is desired to deny to the people of the United States the legitimate use of the functions of Government which they have created. The question with regard to these activities and all others of their class is simply one of whether there has been economy and efficiency in requiring an honest return for the expenditure of the taxpayer's money. On this point the Democratic Party can point with pride to the fact that the cost of administering the established activities of the Government is materially reduced in most if not all of the branches of the public service, and that a larger amount of work is done for the same, and in many instances, for a less expenditure. There are a number of instances in this legislative, executive, and judicial bill now before the House which completely establish this fact.

Our partisan critics have overlooked another important element in their calculations. Not only has there been a normal growth of governmental business according to the laws as they existed under Republican rule, but there have been passed since the advent of the Sixty-second Congress a large number of acts defining new offenses, imposing punishments for crimes and misdemeanors, and preventing various wrongs and frauds in interstate commerce. These criminal and semicriminal statutes require for their enforcement certain additions to the salary roll of the Government. No law is self-enforcing, but special agents, inspectors, and other officials must be provided or the administration would be open to the charge of failing to carry out the constitutional duty of seeing that the laws of the Union are faithfully executed. Among this class of legislation may be mentioned the act of July 31, 1912, to prohibit the importation and transportation in interstate commerce of films of prize fights, etc.; the act of August 20, 1912, to regulate the importation of nursery stock; the act of August 24, 1912, to prohibit the admission of adulterated seeds and grains; the act of March 3, 1913, to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to inspection; the act restricting the sale of habit-forming drugs; and various other acts. These and other measures of their class are necessary for the protection of the life and property of American citizens, and the expense of administering each new law appears in some form in the appropriations of Congress. It is scarcely to be assumed that our partisan critics would refuse to appropriate for the enforcement of such laws. To do so would be to trick and deceive the American public by passing laws supposed to be for the prevention of a public evil, with no intention of providing for their enforcement. Our critics, therefore, if they were in power, would be compelled to provide the expense of enforcement or else repeal the laws. Which course would they pursue, and, if any of the laws are to be repealed, which laws? Let them be fair with the American public in their criticism and point out the specific instances of extravagance or unnecessary expenditure of the public money.

These do not embrace all of the additional burdens upon the Federal Treasury which are represented by annual appropriations. There is another class of special appropriations for specific objects or for emergencies of various kinds. Among these may be mentioned the act of October 3, 1912, appropriating $350,000 for maintaining and protecting levees on the Mississippi River against a threatened flood; the act of April 8, 1912, appropriating $30,000 to repair and restore the historic battle flags of the United States; an additional appropriation of April 16, 1912, of $300,000 for the Mississippi levees; the act of April 30, 1912, requiring the Director of the Census to publish additional statistics on the subject of tobacco; the act of May 9, 1912, appropriating $50,000 to check the encroachment of the Missouri River in Dakota County, Nebr.; the act of May 9, 1912, appropriating a total of $1,239,179.65 for the relief of flood sufferers in the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys; various acts providing large amounts for the relief of American citizens fleeing from Mexico; the act of July 22, 1912, requiring the Director of the Census to collect and publish certain statistics on cotton; an act of August 24, 1912, to give effect to the convention between Great Britain, the United States, and Russia for the protection of fur seals in Alaska; the act of April 30, 1912, appropriating $1,500,000 to rebuild the levees on the Mississippi River; the act of March 2, 1913, appropriating $32,000 to collect and publish records of the Revolutionary War; the additional expense caused by the two extra sessions of Congress; the act of June 23, 1913, appropriating $50,000 for participation in the Panama-Pacific Exposition; additional appropriations amounting to $785,000 for the relief of sufferers from floods in the Ohio Valley; the cost of the memorial to the loyal women of the Civil War, which was $400,000; the act of February 23, 1914, providing for a special appropriation of $600,000 to stamp out an epidemic of hog cholera, and a similar appropriation of $2,000,000 to stamp out an epidemic of the foot-and-mouth disease; an appropriation of July 29, 1914, providing for a monument to Francis Scott Key at Baltimore, Md., costing $75,000; the appropriations of August 3 and August 5, 1914, for the relief of American citizens in Europe, amounting to $2,750,000; an appropriation on September 11, 1914, of $1,000,000 for the additional expense for representing the diplomatic interests of various foreign governments in the belligerent countries; the act of March 4, 1915, providing for the payment of an accumulation of more than 15 years of the findings of the Court of Claims on claims of certain loyal citizens whose property was destroyed by the Federal troops during the Civil War, amounting in all to $1,866,555.04.

These new expenditures and those which were of an extraordinary character and not part of the expenses of any of the regular departments of the Government will be found to account for the amount which our partisan critics claim the Democratic appropriations exceed the Republican appropriations. In other words, if we deduct from the aggregate appropriations of the two Democratic Congresses the amount of these new and extraordinary expenses it will be found that the Democratic administration has carried on the work of the Government more economically and more efficiently than the preceding one. So, when our critics point to a percentage of increase in the total appropriations they are not quite fair with the American public in not showing the items of appropriation and the purposes for which they were devoted. In this connection it would be well to ask these same critics to specify and enumerate for the benefit of the American people which of these extraordinary expenses they opposed and which they would have voted against if they had been in power.

However fully these superficial criticisms of Democratic extravagance may already have been answered, in the words of the old song, still "There is more to follow." It might be assumed that we were only trying to prove that we have done as well as the Republican administration, which would be faint praise indeed, or even that we had done better than they in carrying on the work of the Government for less money than they, but we are not content with such a negative victory. The Democratic pledges to the American people reach further than this. We pledged them not only that the Democratic administration would be economical but also that it would be efficient. Economy does not consist in niggardliness, nor does it always consist in doing without the necessary activities of government. True economy consists in adapting the means to the end and in spending money where that expenditure is represented by increased wealth, added safety, and enlarged social opportunities to the people. Only a state of national destitution would justify a Government like the United States in refusing to add to its activities those things which are clearly demanded for the betterment of the people. Money thus used, whether it be invested in permanent improvements or in enlarged social service, is not an extravagance.

When the people demand that the Government carry on certain activities they have common sense enough to know that the successful conduct of such activities will involve expense to be paid out of the Federal Treasury. One of the greatest evils of Republican rule was the pretense always made that the Government of the United States was carried on without expense to its citizens and that in some way it secured its revenues from the blue sky or the fresh air. Some false economists even went so far as to argue that we had a way of taxing foreigners. The truth, of course, is that the system of indirect taxation, such as the tariff, falls more heavily upon the poorer classes and less heavily upon those having accumulated or inherited wealth, while direct taxation, such as the income tax, falls more heavily upon inherited wealth and not upon the consuming power of honest toil. This is the vital difference between the two systems. It results, however, from the direct system of taxation that the American people know how much taxes they are paying and what they are paying it for, while by the indirect method of taxation, like the tariff, the whole object is to pluck the goose and get the maximum amount of feathers with the minimum amount of squawking. The whole object of indirect taxation is to create an unfair distribution of the public burden and conceal the sources of public income and thus distract the public attention from a critical examination of public expenditures.

Mr. FESS. I wondered whether you would be willing to entirely supersede the indirect methods of taxation by the direct method?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir; theoretically. I am in favor of the direct methods, and I will tell you why. A man can see in his tax bill how much he pays. One great objection to the long course of Republican rule has been that it in some way or other inculcated the idea pretty generally in the country that Uncle Sam's money grew on bushes and that if an expense would be shouldered on the Federal Government no one had to pay it. Only a people capable of the highest form of self-government can face a direct tax and pay their money deliberately out of their own pockets.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. If that be true, why do you not introduce the direct method of taxation altogether? Why do you not abandon the indirect method?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows as well as I do that his party has been most inconsistent until at last, when they found themselves facing a deficit under the administration of President Taft, they promptly fell back upon a tax on corporations. They have been so utterly inconsistent and have played so much upon opportunities in their Federal taxation that with them an indirect tax was not a question of principle but of expedience. Every change of taxation is a comparatively sweeping change and can not be made without some gradual preparation.

Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman condemning the Republican Party for resorting to a direct tax?

Mr. BORLAND. No. I am complimenting the Republican Party, even in its inconsistency, for having had the courage at last to tax the corporations.

Mr. FESS. Why do you not entirely use the direct tax? You say the indirect tax is bad.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought I had answered the gentleman before.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman mean the Republicans will not let you do it?

Mr. BORLAND. No. No system of taxation existing for a hundred years for a hundred million people can be changed overnight.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman mean, or is it the theory of the Democratic Party, to go to the direct system of taxation entirely?

Mr. BORLAND. I call myself a Democrat, and as such I think I am expressing the Democratic theories; but, as to what is the policy of the Democratic Party, I am not their authorized spokesman.

Mr. FESS. What is the interpretation of the Secretary of the Treasury's statement when he spoke about the horsepower tax on automobiles and said that that was not to come off the purchaser but off the manufacturer? What do you mean by that?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no idea. That is not my statement, and I never examined the statement closely. I do know that the Republicans, minus all these activities in the interest of the American people, were confronted by a deficit in this House and were wrestling and struggling with that growing deficit and did not know how to dispose of it, but finally concluded to resort to a direct tax on corporations.

The Democratic administration is proud of the fact that it enacted into law and put into successful operation more constructive legislation in four years than has been done in any previous 40 years in our country's history. The prosaic tale told by the appropriation bills begins to sparkle with the light and life of human interest when we read between the lines as to what these great activities represent. They show the rising tide of public opinion in this country, which demands that the highest efficiency of the Federal Government shall be at the service of humanity and shall be used for the enlargement of opportunities, the betterment of social conditions, and the protection of the life and health of the average citizen. They are based upon the great principle, "the man is the greatest asset of the nation." Every one of the wonderful reforms were fought secretly and openly by champions of special privilege on the ground that they were unconstitutional and beyond the powers of the Federal Government. No proposal was ever made that the Government should use its power for the benefit of all rather than for the benefit of the privileged few that an attack was not made upon it on the ground that it was a violation of the sacred Constitution. But behind the mask of constitutional objection was always to be found the leering face of greed. I now challenge our partisan critics to say which of the great measures of constructive reform passed by the Democratic Congresses they are willing to denounce as unwise and which they are willing to obligate themselves to repeal if they are again intrusted with power. Be it remembered that each of these activities represents a permanent and, in many cases, a growing charge upon the Federal Treasury, which amounts have gone to swell the amount of the appropriations of the American Congress and which have been denounced by partisan critics. Are we right in assuming that by decreasing the aggregate of expenditures they would have to cut some of the items, and if so, which items? Let me give you a few of the great constructive acts which, it is true, have laid burdens upon the Federal Treasury, but which palpitate with the warm red blood of human interest. Let us take the act of February 3, 1912, the first enrolled bill of the Democratic House of Representatives. It was an act extending the act giving compensation to injured employees so as to include artisans, laborers, and other employees of the Bureau of Mines and the Forestry Service. This has added to Uncle Sam's yearly expenditure, but our critics are welcome to attack the Democratic Party for its passage and to pledge themselves to its repeal.

Again, on April 9, 1912, an act was passed establishing the Children's Bureau. The original law provided for the expenditure of $15,000 for the organization and conduct of the bureau. It was placed in charge of the Department of Labor and at the head of it was placed that wonderful woman, Miss Julia Lathrop, of Chicago. She began the study of the health and care of children in the crowded industrial sections of the great cities. She sought to find the causes of diseases by which more than 25 per cent of the little souls perish during the first 12 months of their lives. She went further back into the prenatal care of children and the relation between the workshop and motherhood. She took up the subject of juvenile crime to see how much was due to neglect and how much to the fact that the child was defective mentally or physically. In this she was seeking the cause of the great and growing burden of criminality, the expense of which ultimately falls upon the American taxpayer. She was seeking to stop the manufacture of criminals by controlling the evil at its source. When she came before Congress after one year of work she asked for greatly enlarged appropriations, which Congress authorized in response to a public demand. The appropriation of 1912 for the Children's Bureau was $15,000; the appropriation for 1917, $164,640. Perhaps our partisan critics would repeal this law and stop this wasteful expenditure of the people's money, for the Democratic Party stands convicted of having created and enlarged the Children's Bureau.

On May 11, 1912, there was passed the celebrated dollar-a-day pension act for the veterans of the Civil War. This caused an addition of many millions of dollars to the annual expenditure of the Government, but it is scarcely to be expected that our partisan critics will raise any question of its repeal.

Similarly, on February 19, 1913, a bill was passed to increase the pensions of surviving soldiers of the Indian wars.

On June 19, 1912, an act was passed limiting to eight hours the work of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States. This has added somewhat to the bids for public work, and our critics, if they choose, can denounce this act as a wanton piece of Democratic extravagance.

On August 14, 1912, an act was passed to reorganize the Public Health Service—enlarge it and increase the pay of its officers. The stamping out of pellagra, bubonic plague, yellow fever, smallpox, and typhoid fever has proceeded with signal success. Even cases of infantile paralysis are promptly discovered and the epidemic materially checked. Is this the extravagance with which we are charged? If so, we shall have to plead guilty, for I find that in 1914 the appropriations for the Public Health Service were $597,640; in 1915, $679,858; in 1916, $695,000; and the estimates for the year 1917 are $788,550. This only increases that portion of the work relating to the spread of contagious diseases, but the total cost of the Public Health Service and all its branches increased from $2,414,746 in 1914 to $2,991,656 in the estimates for 1917.

On August 23, 1912, Congress created the Commission on Industrial Relations to study the cause of unemployment and the reasons for industrial unrest. The total appropriations for that commission, which has just closed its labors, have been $450,000, all made in the years of 1914, 1915, and 1916. There is now a widespread demand by economists and labor leaders for an additional expense of at least $50,000 for the printing and distribution of the report of this commission.

In the last two Congresses we have established a legislative assembly for Hawaii and for Alaska, giving local self-government and home rule to those Territories at an added expense to the Federal Government of approximately $50,000 annually in each case.

On August 24, 1912, a bill was passed for the permanent government and operation of the Panama Canal. Our critics have always deducted from the total of their own expenditures the amount paid out by them for the construction work on the Panama Canal on the ground that this was not a continuing expense but a special investment. Now, however, we are confronted with a continuing annual charge upon the Government of some $4,000,000, which must be added to the fixed expense represented by the appropriation bills. In a similar manner the time has come under the terms of the treaty with Panama when we must begin our annual payment to that Republic which was promised as a part of the consideration for the acquisition of the Canal Zone. These payments were to begin nine years after the date of the treaty. The annual payment is $250,000. The first three annual payments have been made under the present administration.

On February 25, 1913, was passed the act to enlarge and extend the operations of the Bureau of Mines. As told in the prosy tale of figures, the result has been that the expense of the Bureau of Mines in 1912 under Republican rule, was $475,500; in 1913 it was increased to $583,100; in 1914, $662,000; in 1915, $725,000; in 1916, $757,300; and the estimates for 1917 are $992,810. These dry figures represent literally the saving of human lives. No other estimate can be made of the wonderful work accomplished by the Bureau of Mines. Formerly it was common to pick up the morning paper and read of some horrible mining disaster in some portion of the country where scores or hundreds of humble workmen were suddenly overwhelmed by causes and dangers against which they could not protect themselves and from which they had no more chance of escape than rats in a trap. The newspaper always told of the hysterical crowd of women and children who surrounded the mouth of the mine, and pictured the heartrending scenes as they waited hour after hour for news while the men were working frantically to discover whether any of the entombed miners were left alive. Many of these accidents were due to the callousness of greed. Many were due to ignorance, inexperience, and lack of scientific regulation. Most of these horrors were preventable. How long has it been since we have read of one of these great and frightful mining disasters? It seems strange that such a familiar object on the newspaper page should in such a few years have slipped out of sight. The answer is, "read between the lines of the record of Democratic expenditures for the growth of the work of the Bureau of Mines." To-day the whole subterranean strata of the United States is mapped and charted by scientific rules, every condition has been studied which bears upon the safety and efficiency of removing the wealth from below the ground. The question of ventilation and additional exits has been crystallized into uniformity of regulations. The power of explosives used in blasting below ground has been scientifically tested and explained to every mine owner. The conditions which bring about the combination of poisonous gases are thoroughly known, and the means to counteract and avoid them are at hand. In addition to this, mine rescue stations have been established in a great many sections of the country. To-day, if a sudden disaster occurs in a mine a rescue car is sent from the nearest station to the mouth of the mine, fully equipped with life-saving devices, first aid and restoratives. There are oxygen helmets and scientific appliances of all kinds for the purpose of rescue. Uncle Sam stands guard at the mouth of the mine, and as long as there is an American citizen entombed within its depths, no matter how humble his condition or how low his pay, no effort is spared until he is gotten out. Perhaps our partisan critics are opposed to this reckless expenditure of Government money. If so, they are free to plead their cause at the bar of American public opinion.

On March 1, 1913, an act was passed to provide for the physical valuation of railroads. Of course the railroads did not like it. It was well understood that the great work undertaken would cost money. That work has proceeded as rapidly as a work of such magnitude can be carried on, and it is expected that it will form a solid basis for a just regulation of carriers in fixing their rates charged to farmers and business men throughout the country. The amount added to the Federal expense from this cause alone was, in 1913, $100,000; 1914, $400,000; 1915, $2,300,000; 1916, $3,000,000; and the estimate for 1917 of $3,000,000. Here is a chance for our critics to show their objection to Democratic expenditures by pledging to the American people to repeal this law and leave the carriers free to offer evidence in courts based upon their own estimate of the cost of their property.

In other respects the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission has grown. It has heard and decided an increasing number of cases of discriminations against shippers and localities in different parts of the country. In 1914 the commission cost the Government $1,805,000; in 1915, $4,050,000; in 1916, $4,765,000; and the estimate for 1917 is $5,090,000. An increase has been apparent in the work of the commission in enforcing the laws providing for safety devices upon trains, and in 1916 an expense began to be incurred, amounting to $220,000 a year, for the inspection of boilers of locomotives. The enforcement of safety regulations is costing the Government $500,000 a year. The Democratic Party will have to plead guilty to this expense, and on the great ledger of public opinion it will take credit for the saving of lives of 75 per cent of railroad employees formerly killed or injured by accidents. Before the safety-appliance laws were enforced the mortality among railroad men was greater than among condemned and convicted criminals. To-day 75 per cent of those injuries and deaths have been eliminated. Out of every four men who annually went down to death in the tremendous industrial warfare of the railroads, leaving four families without their breadwinner, four widows to care for a group of future citizens, four sets of orphans to become the victims of child labor or juvenile crime, to-day by operation of the humane safety-device laws of Congress three of those families have their breadwinner with them. Whether it will be possible to eliminate wholly the dangers of railroading can not now be determined, but the Democratic Party is willing to take credit for the lives, the safety, and continued usefulness of the thousands upon thousands of railroad employees as an offset to the expenditure of the Federal money.

On March 3, 1913, Congress passed an eight-hour day for laborers and mechanics on public works in the District of Columbia. By the act of March 4, 1913, there was created the Department of Labor by a division of the Department of Commerce and Labor. The Secretary of Labor was made a member of the President's Cabinet, a separate set of offices and a separate organization of his work was provided at a considerable increase in the annual expenses of the Government. Possibly in the eyes of our critics this was an instance of Democratic extravagance.

On July 15, 1913, there was passed an act to provide for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration between employers and employees. This was designed to prevent strikes and to save the distressing loss to wage earners, to capital, and to the public growing out of labor disputes. Its work has been singularly successful and many strikes and lockouts have been avoided. It may be noted that this act was passed during the Sixty-third Congress, soon after the inauguration of the Wilson administration.

On December 23, 1913, was passed the act to create the Federal reserve banks, a great reform in our monetary system by which commerce and industry were forever divorced from speculation and the chains which the Money Trust of Wall Street had forged and riveted upon the limbs of American commerce were broken. Three times since the Civil War our country has been prostrated by panics caused wholly by stock gamblers of Wall Street who had obtained control of the money and credits of the Nation and who dragged legitimate business down in the maelstrom of disaster which the ordinary business man neither caused nor could control. To-day we know from the tremendous and unparalleled disturbance which we have passed through during the last 18 months that our financial system is practically panic proof. There is no nation in the world whose finances are so safe or whose national credit is so high as that of the United States. If there were nothing else to the credit of the Democratic administration, this one act would stamp it for all time as the most successful administration in the history of our Republic. So many have been the great acts crowding upon the present administration that we have almost lost sight of even so recent and great an accomplishment.

To return once more to our dry tale, on March 12, 1914, conservation became an affirmative instead of a negative force. The development of Alaska was taken out of the grip of the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate and the construction of the Alaska Railroad was authorized. The sums expended for this purpose are reimbursable to the Federal Treasury out of the sales of public lands of Alaska, but for the time being they are added to the aggregate of expenditure represented by the appropriation bills, and therefore come within the criticism of Democratic extravagance. In 1915 the amount expended for this purpose was $1,000,000; in 1916, $2,000,000; and an urgent deficiency bill has just passed Congress carrying $2,000,000 for this purpose, and the estimate for 1917 is $8,247,620.

One of the leading items of additional expense incurred under the Democratic administration, and one which must be reckoned with in the future as a fixed and continuing expense, is caused by the law passed May 8, 1914, establishing cooperative agricultural extension work by the joint action of the Federal Government and the States. This is what is called a permanent appropriation and is so arranged that it is increased each year. Its justification lies in the tremendous value to the American farmers of the extension of practical farm-demonstration work into the great rural producing sections of the country. Much has been done in a scientific way for the business men of the cities, giving them the aid of the most approved scientific methods in conducting their business. The Lever law attempts to do the same thing for the farmer, who constitutes the great majority of our producing population. This law was the result of a widespread demand that the farming industry be recognized and encouraged for the benefit not only of the farmers themselves but of the consuming public as well. We challenge our critics to say whether they would repeal this law and stop the expense entailed thereby. The appropriation for the first year was $480,000, for the second year $600,000, and thereafter it will increase at the rate of $500,000 per year.

On September 2, 1914, Congress took a bold step to meet the extraordinary conditions growing out of the outbreak of the war in Europe by creating a War Risk Bureau, for which it appropriated $5,100,000. This money will not all be spent. In fact, it will probably remain intact, as the bureau has been conducted with remarkable economy and success, but it is added by our Republican critics to the gross amount of expenditure by the Democratic administration.

Congress found American commerce paralyzed at the outbreak of the war—cotton, wheat, and all other American products piled up awaiting shipment, prices demoralized, and even loans on warehouse receipts refused by the banks. Widespread suffering and business disaster was threatened from this cause in the midst of a season of splendid crop production. We were starving in the midst of plenty. The reason was that we could not move our products abroad on account of the danger to neutral commerce caused by the belligerents. If the cargoes could be insured against the war risk, the crops would begin to move and business revive. The narrow and provincial policy of the Republican Party, which surrounded us with a tariff wall, drove American shipping off the seas, made us a debtor nation to Europe, and prevented the building up of great marine insurance companies in this country, so that there was no private agency equipped to handle this emergency. In this crisis Congress established the War Risk Bureau to insure cargoes of American goods going abroad. Not a dollar has been lost by this bureau. It has steadily paid its own way, and the effect upon American commerce and upon the price of cotton and wheat has been magical. Let our critics challenge this act while they are objecting to the Democratic expenditures.

During the Republican rule the trusts flourished as the green bay tree. Nothing but blank cartridges were ever fired at them. From the election of McKinley to the defeat of Taft the capitalization of trusts and combinations in this country increased 4,000 per cent. The Democratic administration came into power pledged to abandon the Don Quixote method of attack and to create a strong and efficient agency to search out and correct unfair methods of competition and trade. On September 26, 1914, in redemption of this pledge, Congress passed the Federal Trade Commission bill. The expense of this commission was as follows: In 1915, $269,633; 1916, $355,000; estimates for 1917, $544,666.61. As the result of the policy that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure and that it is better to keep competition alive than to fine its murderers after its death, this commission has already gained the confidence of the business public, and to-day business is freer from the brutality of organized greed than at any time since the Civil War.

Of course, there has been an increase of printing for all of the great departments of the Government. There have been increases in the following items which are presented for the analysis of our Republican critics. The cost of the quarantine service has increased from $15,000 to $70,000; the Coast and Geodetic Survey, from $1,024,000 to $1,076,000; the Bureau of Fisheries, from $1,137,000 to $1,454,000; the survey of public lands, from $450,000 to $700,000; the expenses of armories and arsenals to enable the Government to manufacture its own powder and munitions of war and break the bonds of the War Munition Trust has increased from $365,850 under Republican rule to $1,842,350 under Democratic rule. To-day we are able to fix the price of our ammunition more than 20 per cent below what was paid to the private manufacturers during the Republican régime, and the Government is free, at last, from the exactions of the great Du Pont Co.

The Bureau of Standards, which applies modern science to the development of American industry, and which helps to keep the American business man abreast of his foreign competitor for a share of the world's trade, has grown greatly under Democratic rule. The cost of lighthouses and aids to navigation was only $526,500 under Republican rule. To-day the annual appropriation in the estimates for 1917 is $2,402,500. The cost of protecting the withdrawn oil lands from being grabbed up by the Oil Trust has now amounted to a little over $200,000. For the Lincoln Memorial there has been appropriated $2,000,000 since 1914, and the limit of cost has been increased another $500,000. The amphitheater at Arlington to commemorate the heroic dead of both sides of the great civil struggle has been entirely built in the Democratic administration, at a cost of $750,000.

One effect of the war in Europe has been to turn back the tide of American tourists who formerly took abroad about $200,000,000 annually. This money is being largely spent within the United States, and as a wise encouragement to keep our own money at home Congress is developing the great playgrounds of the people, the national parks.

The natural beauty of our country is beyond all description. In variety, in grandeur, in artistic beauty, in wonderful effects of lights and distances, and in the variations of climate from the softness of the Italian sky to the rugged strength of Norway, America can offer attractions which shall not only keep her own tourists at home, but attract those of other lands. Few Americans, especially those of the wealthier classes, know America. The estimates of the expenditures on our national parks requested by the present Department of the Interior have increased from 50 to 300 per cent above the amount spent under Republican rule, but it is confidently assumed that every dollar of this expenditure will be repaid a thousandfold in retaining American money in America.

One of the most striking instances of the growth of expenditures is in the Agriculture Department. The fiscal year of 1913 saw a total appropriation for agriculture by the Federal Government of $21,265,193.75. In the fiscal year of 1914, as the joint act of a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, the appropriation was $22,946,623.28. In the fiscal year 1915, which was the first year entirely under Democratic rule, the appropriation for the Agriculture Department increased to $28,508,967.47. In 1916 the amount was $28,512,278.48, and the estimate for 1917 is $29,763,089. It will be noticed that there is a sudden jump in the appropriations for agriculture as soon as the administration passed wholly into the hands of the Democrats. We invite criticism of our Republican friends to this item either as a total or to any one of the multitude of items which compose it, and we invite them to say to their farmer friends what they disapprove of—any or all—of these expenditures for agriculture.

To be sure, there is nothing to boast of in the mere expenditure of public money. During the seven years I have been in this House I have established a record as a strict economist. I have voted against every raid on the Federal Treasury, every salary grab, every gratuity, every special privilege, even when they affected the pockets of Congressmen themselves. The money in the Treasury represents taxes imposed on the American people. It is a trust fund to be paid out only for the public benefit. Therefore, in all cases of doubt, I have resolved the doubt in favor of the taxpayers and voted "No." Before I am willing to vote for an appropriation a clear case in its favor must be made. This is the only proper attitude for a member of the great Appropriation Committee, which is charged with the duty of disbursing the people's money. No one not a member of that committee knows how many demands we are compelled to refuse. As the poet says:

> What's done, we partly can compute,
> But never what's resisted.

Therefore I say that it is not the amount of public money that is spent, but the purposes for which it is spent, that is the real test of efficiency. A strict economist myself, I feel that I have a right to resent criticisms of the Democratic administration based solely on general figures.

This is a great and growing country. Its interests are becoming larger and its activities more numerous. No party worthy of the confidence of the American people would refuse to extend the aid and encouragement of the Government to all proper projects for the development of the country. If the people want the work done by the Government, they are ready and willing to pay the bills. The most striking thing about the Democratic expenditures is the fact that they are all in the direction of enlarging the opportunities of the average citizen and giving a better chance to the producers and toilers who support the Nation. There is a school of political thought which is exemplified by our partisan critics, which holds that all attempts on the part of the Government to aid the individual citizen to better his condition in life are unconstitutional and beyond the powers of the National Government. We Democrats hold to a different theory. We hold that the Government should extend to farmers, railroad men, miners, seafaring men, independent merchants and manufacturers, and the great mass of the wage-earning class every encouragement to advance their social and material condition in life, and that in so doing we are increasing the power and wealth of our Nation by raising the standard of the average citizen. We have long had a government "of the people"; now, under the Democratic rule we are achieving a government "by the people," and the results are shown in the fact that we are beginning to have a government "for the people" for the first time in human history.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WILSON of Florida having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9416) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois use some of his time?

Mr. MANN. I yield 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, in the course of a few days I have no doubt that the bill H. R. 10384 will come before this House for its action. That is the bill which has been before this House many years, attempting the regulation of immigration; and inasmuch as the time for general debate is but three hours and a half upon a side, I have asked that I may have the privilege of taking 20 minutes this afternoon to lay some observations before the committee.

The older Members of the House are familiar with the fact that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and myself were members of the Immigration Commission appointed by Congress in 1907, which remained in existence until December, 1910, and that as a part of our duties we traveled through those parts of Europe from which these immigrants come. I had the pleasure and performed the duty of going twice in the year 1907 to different parts of Europe, and that particular experience has given us a knowledge which, it seems to me, the gentleman from Alabama and myself both ought to bring to the attention of the House.

Now this bill is very similar to other bills, two of which have been vetoed by successive Presidents of the United States, except that in certain portions this bill is more strict, and in certain portions it is more lenient. But we have got to a point in the discussion of this matter when we ought to tell some facts about it on the floor which have not very much been told.

In the hearings before the committee appeared Miss Grace Abbott, of Chicago, than whom no woman is doing greater service in behalf of the United States. Miss Abbott gives her entire time, her entire devoted time, to the welfare of the immigrants. She is herself of Puritan stock, of old American lineage, and a Protestant in religion; and this is what she said on page 6 of the hearings of January 20:

> I think many people oppose the recent immigration because it is Catholic and Jewish instead of Protestant, as the earlier was. I am neither Catholic nor Jewish.

This bill is drawn, or attempted to be drawn, so as to affect almost alone the Catholic people; and I, being a Protestant, and of old American lineage, so far as old American lineage goes, can afford to say that, for the same reason that prompts Miss Abbott to say it, because both she and I believe in the old American principle of religious freedom and the right of a man to worship or to refrain from worshiping, according to the dictates of his own conscience.

I can demonstrate in two ways that this bill is aimed—whether intentionally or not I am not saying at the moment; but when a bill has been reported in five or six Congresses in succession, you have almost a right to assume that those who report it know what they are doing—that this bill is aimed at immigrants who are Catholics.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was on the committee there never were any "ifs" or "ands" about him. He called a spade a spade; and in his report which accompanied the bill in the Fifty-ninth Congress he furnished the percentages of people who would be affected by the literacy test, the main thing in the bill, and here they are. Incidentally, for the first time I think in the history of this legislation, although I may be in error about that, this particular information is not in the report connected with this year's bill.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], on page 21 of the report (No. 3021), presented the following figures on the percentages of illiteracy:

	Per cent.
South Italian	56
Polish	40
Slovak	25
Hebrew	23
North Italian	14
Magyar	12

Those are the major percentages. The minor percentages are as follows:

	Per cent.
German	4
Irish	3
Scandinavian	1

In other words, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] brought prominently to the attention of the House the fact that the northern and Protestant races—with the exception of the Hebrews, of whom I will speak in a moment—were not affected by the literacy test, while the southern and Catholic nations were the ones that would be excluded. Now, if it was desired to bar out immigrants for the reason that we were getting too many, there has been a bill pending in Congress ever since I first came here that would do it. That is a bill which would prevent any more immigrants coming from any one country than the average that have come from that country in the last five years. In other words, it would apply it to all countries equally, but that is not desired. Their desire is to keep out the immigrants from Catholic countries, and it is time that we who are Protestants should have the courage to call attention to that fact. Now, that is accentuated in this bill by the very evident attempt that is made to let in the Hebrews.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he goes on with that?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In view of the fact that the immigration from the northern countries is largely Protestant and the immigration from the southern countries of Europe is largely Catholic, does not the gentleman think that if it were vice versa—if the industrious northern immigrants were Catholics and the less industrious immigrants from the southern countries were Protestants—does not the gentleman think the same objection would be made to the immigration from southern countries? Does the gentleman think it is really the religion that is the objection?

Mr. BENNET. I will answer the gentleman with the statement——

Mr. FESS. I am in favor of this bill, but I should very much dislike to be said to be in favor of it because it is religious.

Mr. BENNET. All right. I will answer the gentleman with a statement of what happened to me in my recent election. On the occasion of the first speech that I made in The Bronx a representative of the Junior Order of American Mechanics, who were organized about the same year as the Know-Nothing Party, according to their own literature, which states that they have been fighting all immigration for 60 years, a representative of that organization met me as I came out of the hall and said, "Congressman, there are nine councils of our order in The Bronx, and we have got our eye on you." And if the gentleman will look up the hearings in the Sixtieth Congress, after I was defeated for that Congress, he will find that the legislative agent of that order in New York State came before the committee in that Congress and rejoiced that I was defeated because of my opposition to the literacy test. And I will say to the gentleman, from my experience, dating back now 12 years on this matter, I have no doubt whatever that a very large part of the pressure behind this activity for the literacy test is because of the fact that the literacy test, as shown by the figures of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will keep out Catholics.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will yield further to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] first.

Mr. FESS. The defeat the gentleman speaks of may have been the result of this, but it certainly was not the gentleman's opposition to any religious sect, was it, which induced him to vote this way or that way?

Mr. BENNET. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. FESS. I mean that if the gentleman was punished by these people because of his activity on this legislation, it was not a justifiable punishment, was it? Was it not the gentleman's purpose to make a better class of immigrants, rather than to exclude people of any religious denomination?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to be laboring under the impression that I voted for this literacy test. I voted against it.

Mr. FESS. I thought the gentleman said he was defeated because he voted for it?

Mr. BENNET. God forbid that I should ever vote for that. I voted against the literacy test, and because I voted against it the Junior Order of the United American Mechanics went out openly in 1910 to defeat me.

Mr. FESS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not get that impression.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. In other words, the gentleman from New York was defeated because he is a great big, broad American who has nothing against any religious sect.

Mr. BENNET. I would not want to admit that from any standpoint.

Mr. GALLIVAN. And did the gentleman know that every anti-Catholic newspaper in this country last year was in favor of this bill, and that when it was vetoed at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, Woodrow Wilson was crucified for his veto and was accused of being tied up with the Roman Catholic Church?

Mr. BENNET. I never read any religious paper except the Christian Intelligencer, the organ of the Dutch Reformed Church, and one or two Presbyterian papers.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COLEMAN. Does the gentleman think the labor organizations of this country are for this bill because of any religious issue?

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman that I would imagine the bulk of the members of the American Federation of Labor are Catholic, but the head of it, Mr. Gompers, is not, and I do not think that Mr. Morrison is.

Mr. GALLIVAN. He is not.

Mr. BENNET. And the treasurer——

Mr. GALLIVAN. He is not.

Mr. BENNET. The treasurer is a Presbyterian, so that those in control are not Catholics and in that they are absolutely misrepresenting——

Mr. GALLIVAN. And may I suggest that those in control are endeavoring to deliver the American Federation of Labor, when the great body of that association is opposed to this bill.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENNET. Just one more question and then I will have to decline to yield further.

Mr. COLEMAN. Is is not true that a number of the local federations of labor have sent petitions in favor of this bill, and that they acted on their own initiative, a majority of the membership being Catholics.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the first part of the gentleman's question I will answer in the affirmative, as I can do so from the contents of my own mail. Local bodies have sent petitions. Whether they have acted on their own initiative I do not know, and, very frankly, I will say that I do not—well, I do not know.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; one more.

Mr. FESS. One more, and that is all. Twice this body passed this bill. Does the gentleman think that the body was actuated by any religious motive in voting for it?

Mr. BENNET. I will answer the gentleman frankly. We are all human. We like to vote to please our constituents, and the constituents of a good many Members here ask them to vote particular ways. What actuated those people back in the districts is one thing. I think every Member here votes according to the dictates of his own conscience, and I think that the A. P. A. or the Know-Nothing spirit is very small in this body.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one more question?

Mr. BENNET. Well, I have said I would not yield, but I will yield once more.

Mr. McCRACKEN. What is the nature of this literacy test?

Mr. BENNET. That is a good question, and I am glad that I yielded. The literacy test is this:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish.

As I said to the House, that keeps out 56 per cent of the South Italians, and so on. Now, for the first time, the committee has put in a new provision, that takes in all of page 8 and more, which upon its face apparently admits every Hebrew who wants to come except those living in Galicia; but, whether by accident or design, the committee, by a provision on page 19, has excluded everyone whom they purport to admit. Page 19 absolutely nullifies page 8. I do not know whether the committee knows that or not. When I was abroad one of the things I studied was the way that immigrant tickets are sold. After I came back I studied it, and while I was out of the House amongst my clients were some steamship companies, and I studied it some more. This is the way the tickets are bought: A little agent in a small town back in Greece, Italy, Palestine, or Russia has tickets to sell. They are not sold in Hamburg or Vienna or any big place, but they are sold in the little places—that is, 60 per cent of them are—and 40 per cent are sold in the United States, what are known as "prepaid" tickets.

Now, this bill provides, on pages 18 and 19, that the steamship company that brings to this port a person who can not read, saying nothing about the exceptions, but supposing they would construe a person was excludable because unable to read, is fined $200. Now just imagine what will happen back in Russia. It is a very violent assumption to suppose that the steamship agent living in Russia will ever admit to a person living in Russia that he or she will be admitted to the United States because he or she is being persecuted in Russia. Just imagine the situation of an agent in his own country admitting that the person had to leave it because of religious persecution. That would be pretty difficult to imagine. But here is the next step. Here is a woman who comes along and says, "I want to buy a ticket to America," and the ticket agent says, "Can you read?" She says, "No." Then the ticket agent says, "I can not sell a ticket to you." "Oh, but," she says, "my husband is in the United States, and therefore, under the provisions of the immigration law, being the wife of an alien in or a citizen of the United States, I am entitled to come in." But he says, "How do I know these things? How do I know your husband will receive you? How do I know your husband may be living?" And he will not sell her that ticket, because if the steamship company had to pay that $200 fine, it would come out of the pocket of the little agent back in Russia. So with these words in we simply bar out every Hebrew abroad who can not read. Well, suppose you should say that you buy the ticket here. Now imagine a man going to an office on lower Broadway in New York City and saying, "I want to buy a ticket for my wife in Russia to come in here." The question is asked, "Can she read?" He replies, "Why, certainly." "Well," the agent says, "you will have to show us," because there would be nothing in the world to keep that ticket from being transferred, and the steamship company would not take the chance of the $200 fine, and, therefore, the only persons who can come in after this bill passes, if it does, which I hope it will not—if it passes and should become the law and be put in operation—would be the persons who could demonstrate at the time they bought the ticket and under some regulation which would be made that they could not transfer the ticket, that they could read, and, therefore, every single Hebrew who can not read is just as much barred out, if this bill goes through, as he would be barred out if these alleged exceptions were not put in.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BENNET. How can I? I am sorry. If I can have five minutes more——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Illinois control the time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa is in control of the time of the committee on this side, and he told me to yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York. I will take the chance of giving the gentleman 5 minutes more, which otherwise would be yielded to me. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a question.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I recognize the gentleman's ability in this particular legislation, but he has not explained yet, as far as I know, why he thinks this legislation is aimed against Catholics.

Mr. BENNET. I did that before the gentleman came in, and I have not time to do it again, I am sorry to say.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Is it because they are Catholics or because they are ignorant?

Mr. BENNET. It is aimed at them because they are Catholics.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Why?

Mr. BENNET. Because there are a whole lot of people in this country who are ingrained Protestants—I am a Protestant myself—who——

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman does not mean to suggest that all of us are moved by such an influence, does he?

Mr. BENNET. I do not.

Mr. BUTLER. Because I want to disclaim that right here. I am in favor of this bill, but I do not propose for the gentleman to put that on me.

Mr. BENNET. I am making my own speech.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand.

Mr. BENNET. Until I accuse the gentleman of something he need not defend himself.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not looking around for a scrap, but I am disclaiming what the gentleman said as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BENNET. Let us see further who in addition are to be excepted. Curiously enough those who are excluded under this bill are people who live in those portions of Europe which to-day are being most horribly ravaged by war.

The Armenians, amongst whom there has been a massacre in the last eight months unparalleled in civilization, because they live under Turkish rule, the one exception to that which I stated a moment ago, are to a large extent illiterate, and the survivor of a butchered Armenian family attempting to come to this country, where he or she will be cared for, would be barred out of it, because under Turkish misrule education had been denied. That is one.

Second, as to the inhabitants of Poland. I read in a paper the other day about a doctor in Duluth who had just received word through our State Department that his wife, who had gone to Duluth on a visit, had starved to death in Poland. And she is only one of thousands.

It bars out those people because they are illiterate. And then there is what is known as the "Jewish pale" in Russia, which has been swept, as my colleague [Mr. LONDON] could testify, back and forth in this devastating war five times. And if this bill passes without amendment a Jewish man or woman who could not read and who desires to come from that country, from that pale, will be barred out. And I desire to say, as a member of one of the Protestant denominations, it is my belief that whatever sentiment in this country is aimed at the immigrant because he is a Catholic or Jew is absolutely foreign to the real belief of the great bulk of the Protestants in this country, but the sooner we face the fact that a good deal of the pressure behind the bill comes from that source the better it will be. Every time this bill goes up to the President, who is there that goes there opposed to it? The people who could not believe until it got up to the President that a bill like this could pass both Houses and get there, because they are Catholics and Hebrews, and know that their people are being discriminated against.

It was a bad time in this country in the old Know-Nothing days, bad for the whole country, and this bill, if it passes and becomes a law, will start up the same sort of a feeling that there was in 1854, 1855, and 1856, when the State of Massachusetts for three years in succession elected a governor on the Know-Nothing platform, when the State of Maryland in 1856 selected presidential electors on a Know-Nothing platform. I am a Presbyterian and a member of the Presbyterian Church, but I believe that my Catholic brother has just as much right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience as I or my Hebrew brother have. And before I vote to keep a Hebrew or a Catholic out of this country because of his religion I would resign my seat in this House, much as I value it, and if my constituency wanted to send somebody here to vote to keep them out because of their religious conviction, they would have to send some one else.

Mr. FESS. Do you not think that this House would vote out a Protestant who did not meet the conditions of the bill just as quickly as a Catholic?

Mr. BENNET. The answer to that is that this House has had this bill for 10 years. If they want to reduce immigration they can pass the quantity bill, and reduce immigration that applies equally to Protestants and Catholics. When they pass a bill against Catholics and Jews, it is assumed that they know what they are doing.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in response to a resolution of inquiry introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. Instead of formally reporting the resolution to the House, I requested the Secretary just to furnish the information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Post Office bill that I made to-day when that bill was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. You do not want to ask to extend your remarks on the Post Office bill now. You want to get consent in the House to extend your remarks on the Post Office bill.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I was simply following the plan of my friend across the aisle.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes no request, then. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the motion I made to-day when the Post Office apppropriation bill was under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the motion which he made while the Post Office bill was under consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Postmaster General in correspondence relative to the guaranty fund.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAFEAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting correspondence with the Postmaster General on the guaranty fund. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIEST rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. GRIEST. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein an address delivered on Tuesday last by Hon. J. Hay Brown, chief justice of the State of Pennsylvania, on the subject of Washington and national preparedness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Hon. J. Hay Brown, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, on Washington and preparedness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 26, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. STONE. I wish to state that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent from the Senate on account of illness. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to state that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] are absent in attendance upon a meeting of a committee of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend page 6 of the bill, beginning with the word "and," in line 23, striking out down to and including the word "grantee," in line 26. The language that I seek to strike out reads as follows:

> And in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

Mr. President, since the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was defeated yesterday it seems to me that this amendment, if the Senate desires to have any compensation whatever in any case paid to the Government, ought to prevail.

I wish to read that part of the bill down to and including the words I move to strike out, commencing with subdivision "(f)."

> (f) That such grantee in the construction, maintenance and operation of such dam or diversion structure and accessory works may, with the authority of the Secretary of War, occupy and use, to the extent necessary for the project, any lands of the United States, including the public lands; and any part of the public lands may, on certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes, be withdrawn by the President for said purpose as provided in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawal of public lands in certain cases, approved June 25, 1910;" and for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

Had the amendment of the Senator from Montana prevailed, I would not have offered this amendment, but since the amendment of the Senator from Montana has not prevailed, the bill fixing a limitation of the charge that can be made fixes that limitation upon the land taken based upon its value as land, and then instructs the Secretary in the language I want to strike out that even with the value thus ascertained he shall also take into consideration the benefits that would accrue to the United States by reason of the improvement, if any, of navigation; in other words, that after he has ascertained what he will charge according to the rule laid down in the bill, the value of the land, it is a practical instruction to him to then deduct from that value whatever benefit may accrue to the United States in the way of improvement of navigation.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that unless the amendment I have offered prevails the result will be that in no case will there ever be a charge of anything under the bill. The Secretary of War is absolutely prohibited, in the first place, from making any charge that exceeds the value of the land which is taken as land and is then required to offset from that value any benefits that may accrue to the United States by an incidental improvement of the river for navigation purposes.

There is not any doubt, Mr. President, but what the land taken will always be comparatively small in value. There is not any doubt but what in practically, if not all the cases, there will be considerable improvement of navigation when the dam is built. Hence we might just as well say in this law that wherever they build a dam which will improve navigation—and that is the theory and the constitutional peg upon which the law is based—wherever any development is made that improves navigation there shall be no charge for the taking of any of the property of the United States. It does not make any difference whether this land is what is known as the public land or whether it is land that the Government of the United States has purchased, it can only be considered in so far as it is of value as land, and then from that value must be deducted the benefits, if any, and there will always be some, that will accrue to the United States in the way of the improvement of the navigability of the stream.

Mr. President, does the Senate of the United States want to do that? There is not much left, it is true; there would not be very much to pay at any time, since the amendment of the Senator from Montana has been defeated, because the value would always be small, the amount of land taken small, and while it might be in a city and very valuable, the Secretary can charge no more than what it is worth to raise corn and barley. That is the limitation. He can not go any higher.

Now, why not stop at that, if you are going to leave it that way? I am, of course, opposed to leaving it that way, but we have been fighting it over for three or four days, and those of us who think the value ought to be based upon the real value for any purpose to which it may be put were defeated, and there is no provision in the bill that he can ever go in the damages or charges higher than the value of the land as land. Why not stop there? Why should we go further, as this bill provides, and deduct from that small amount the accruing benefit in value that may arise from navigation?

Suppose, Mr. President, in any State of the Union some man wanted to build a gristmill. To do that under the laws of the State he has a right—I presume in every State—to dam up a stream to get power to run the wheels of the mill, and in damming up the stream, while the dam and the buildings might be located on his own land, it would overflow some of the neighbors' land. If the rule of damage that we have laid down in this bill were to prevail, this is what would happen: The court would instruct the jury of condemnation something like this. He would say, "Gentlemen of the jury, ascertain the value of this land that has been overflowed, find how much that land is worth as land, and then, after you have ascertained that amount, find out how much the building of this mill in his vicinity would improve and make more valuable the balance of the land that he owns." If he owned 150 acres of land, and the man who built the dam just below him overflowed by the construction of the dam 10 acres of his land, and the jury found that that land was worth $10 an acre, they would find so far that he was entitled to $100 damages. But under the instructions of the judge, if they had a law like we are trying to pass here, it would be their duty to ascertain how much the building of the mill in that vicinity had improved or increased the value of the balance of his land. He would have 150 acres more of land, and nobody will deny but that the building of the mill near him would improve the value of the balance of his land somewhat; and suppose the jury would say, "We think that the building of this mill has improved the balance of the land $1 an acre." Then they would say, "He is benefited $150; he has lost 10 acres, for which he is entitled to damages of $40; hence we can give him no damages, because in the aggregate the building of that mill has made money for him." Therefore the man who builds the dam and gets the power shall pay him nothing, although it is conceded that the improvement has taken 10 acres of his land. It would only be one step further for this bill to go to say that when the value of the increase in navigation exceeds the value of the land for land purposes, then the man who builds the dam shall be paid that excess; and then, in the case of the illustration I give, the jury would bring in a verdict of $110 against the man who lost his land. For the same reason, if he had to contribute to the building of the mill, every other man in the community would have to contribute. The result would be that those in the vicinity would pay for the building of the mill. The men who are going to contribute in tolls for the mill and make it profitable would pay the expense of its construction and its building. When they did that the other fellow would still own the mill. That is just one step further than we are going here, and it is the next logical step.

If the man who built this dam could have a right to set off against the value of the property that he takes the value of the increase of navigation, then, if the value of the increase in navigation exceeds the value of the land that he takes as land, the Government ought to pay him the difference.

Why, Mr. President, if you were building a railroad through the country and you went through a section where there was not any railroad, let us say, for 40 miles, and you run that railroad along the edge of a man's farm and, let us say, you take 4 acres of his land, and when the railroad is built that man's farm will be worth more than it would have been if the railroad had not been built, under the theory of this bill in that kind of a case the State law ought to provide that when you find out how much land has been taken and then compute its value as land you should offset against that the increased value of the balance of his farm that has been increased by the construction of the railroad. If that were the theory of the law, there could be a railroad built anywhere in the United States without the cost of a cent for the right of way, and yet that is just what we are seeking to do by this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it not true that substantially every State in the Union, in its laws for the taking of property for a public purpose, specifically provides that the benefits that the community, or any member of the community, shall derive from the building of the public utility, whatever it may be, shall not be taken into consideration to reduce the compensation?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of an exception, and I can not conceive of there being an exception, to that rule, I will say to the Senator. That rule of law is as old as are the law books. So far as I know this attempt here in this bill is the first attempt in civilization to change that rule.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it would not be entirely consistent, upon that theory, to enter a judgment in favor of the water-power owners for the amount of benefit received in excess of the value of the land taken?

Mr. NORRIS. I have said that that would logically be the next step. This bill does not provide for that; I am not claiming that it does; but it would be just as logical if it did. In other words, if the owner of the land, whether it be the Government or an individual, ought to pay for the general benefits that come from an improvement in the community, if he ought to pay a part of it, he ought to pay all of it. You can not get away from that; it will be perfectly logical.

Mr. President, I want to call your attention to another proposition. This bill does not provide alone for the public lands of the United States that may be taken. Ordinarily when we speak of the public lands we refer to the lands in the West or in localities where land is subject to be taken under homestead and various other laws providing for the taking of such land. This bill applies to any land that the Government may use. If there were a navigable stream close enough to the Capitol of the United States, where they could use the Capitol Grounds for the construction of a dam, they would be able under this bill, if the Secretary of War consented, to take the Capitol Grounds of the Nation. There could not be any doubt about it; and that is not so far off. We may see the time when we shall have such a navigable stream——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The suggestion which the Senator from Nebraska has just made is borne out by the peculiar language of the bill, which allows them to take the land of the United States, including public lands.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It makes a distinction between land in a general sense and public lands, evidently with the express purpose of allowing them to take lands held and used by the Government for some Government function.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill distinctly provides:

And for any land of the United States so used.

It does not have to be wild, open public land; it may be land within the limits of New York City or of Washington or of Philadelphia.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In line 13, on page 6, the Senator from Nebraska will notice this language:

Any lands of the United States, including the public lands.

It is a rather peculiar expression.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course there is a part of that language which applies only to the public lands, the part that I have read, but which I am not seeking to strike out, where it says: "On certification by the Secretary of War that the same is required for navigation purposes" any public lands may be withdrawn from entry, and so forth. Of course the only land that can be withdrawn from entry is the public land. The land, however, that can be taken is public land and any other land that the United States may own.

As I said a moment ago, while the Capitol Grounds, under present conditions at least, are not located close enough to a navigable stream so that they could be given away for this purpose, yet there are Senators here, I presume, who remember that not so many years ago there was a small stream of water that flowed through the Capitol Grounds across the street, near where the Peace Monument now stands, and then ran through what is now the Botanic Garden. When we were constructing Grant's Monument down there the workmen, in excavating the foundation, came into that old stream, and they had a great deal of trouble to get a good foundation. That is only about a mile away from the Potomac River; and as it has been filled in, it would not be half as far from reason to put into a river and harbor bill a provision to excavate that old stream from the Potomac River to the Capitol Grounds, as are a great many other items that always go into that famous bill to improve dry creeks and blowing sands. When that should be done that little stream would be navigable right to the foot of the Capitol; and if this bill becomes a law and is enforced and they have the right kind of a Secretary of War, he could give a water-power trust the right to dam that stream and use the Capitol Grounds. Probably one end of the dam would be just about where the Senator from Tennessee now sits. [Laughter.] And, Mr. President, when he did——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment I will yield to the Senator—when he did, the only thing that the United States would get, even if my amendment prevails, would be the value of the land where the Capitol stands as land—that is, what it is worth to raise potatoes on; and we know it is on the side of a hill and would not be very good soil. The result would be that the damages would be very small; but under this bill as it is, I know we would not even get that, because it would be said, "We will set off against that the benefits of navigation." I presume the value of the land where the Capitol stands for the purpose of raising barley or corn would not exceed forty or fifty dollars, and the Capitol would be in the way. The trees which have been planted here by our forefathers would have to be destroyed. We could not get anything for them, because they do not add to the value of this tract as land. The Capitol being located on it, does not make the soil any better than it would be if the Capitol were somewhere else, unless it be that being on a hillside, it has so far prevented the dashing rains from washing the soil away; but, under the provisions of this bill as it stands now, the Secretary could say to the water-power man, "The value of the Capitol Grounds, where the Capitol stands, is about $50. However, you have improved navigation to the amount of $500, so that I give it to you; take it, and God speed you on your way."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he is seriously apprehensive that we will have a Secretary of War who will grant the Capitol Grounds for a dam site?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe that will ever happen; but, under this bill, if the tactics are followed which have often been followed in the past in regard to the improvement of navigable streams, that may happen. I am only telling the Senator the possibilities.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desired to ask the question because when the Senator first offered his amendment I thought he was serious, but from his argument I see he was merely humorous in the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am serious, I will say to the Senator; but the illustration I have used may have been a humorous one. I am, however, going to use additional illustrations. Nobody, of course, believes that that would happen; but it could happen. It would be possible, unless we change this bill, for that very thing to occur.

Mr. President, we have a beautiful Potomac Park right along the banks of the Potomac River—this is a suggestion that is not humorous—and if we had a Secretary of War who was willing to do it, he could grant to anybody under this bill, when it shall be enacted into law, the right to build a dam and overflow every foot of that land; and when it came to the assessment of damages they would be assessed under this law on that land as land.

The question would be asked, "How many potatoes will this land raise?" As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] suggests, that would take in the Lincoln Memorial upon which we are spending two or three million dollars. How much is the land worth as land where the Lincoln Memorial stands? Well, comparing the soil here with the kind of soil with which I am familiar at home, it is worth about 25 cents, and that is all under this bill that the Secretary of War would have a right to charge, and, then, if navigation were improved to any extent he would not even charge that.

Why, Mr. President, we have a bridge across the Potomac River, located in an elegant place for a dam, between the Virginia shore and Georgetown. Suppose this bill should pass and the Secretary of War should be willing, and some corporation comes along and says, "We are going to build a dam here right where that bridge stands." The Government owns a little piece of land, I presume, on each side of the river where the abutments of the bridge rest. It is on a sliding slope that would not raise white beans. As land it is not worth 2 cents, and I presume the Secretary of War would violate his duty if he charged a nickel for it as land; but that is all he could charge, and, then, against the 5 cents which he did charge, he would have to deduct for whatever benefits accrued to the river in the way of navigation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] yesterday made some observations which, I presume, if I had made would have been commented upon as the ideas of a dreamer; perhaps it would have been said they were the notions of a reformer, or, perhaps, some would have said of an insurgent, or an anarchist, but, since the Senator from Utah gave utterance to them, they will command respect; and therefore I am perfectly safe in saying that I agree with what he said, and I want to carry out his illustration just a little further. He said that he believed it would not be many years until we would see such wonderful improvement in the development of hydroelectric energy that there would not be any transfer lines and copper wires to carry it from one place to another. Why, Mr. President, do you know we are on the verge of that kind of an era to-day? It may not come very soon, but it may possibly be here to-morrow morning. All that it requires is for some ingenious Yankee to invent a practical storage battery; and storage batteries have been constantly improved in the recollection of all of us every year until they have been so developed that for a great many purposes they constitute to-day the best form of power. It will not require many improvements in the storage battery until every stream that trickles down over the mountain side will be made worth millions, and that value ought to belong to all of the people. We ought to be careful now that we do not give away to corporations for a song the heritage that ought to belong to all.

Mr. President, when that time comes—and let me remind you that the Senator from Utah said it might come to-morrow—you will be able to take a little storage battery no larger than your suit case, and put enough power into it to run an automobile across a State. It will be possible to make electricity wherever a dam is located and put power into freight cars, to be transferred to other places, where it will be utilized to operate factories and do all kinds of manufacturing business. You will be able—and I remind you again this is the proposition of the Senator from Utah—to take a little satchel and go down to headquarters and have it filled with electricity, or perhaps to take a bottle the size of a beer bottle—and when we have enacted the bill which the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has introduced, we will have lots of empty beer bottles, and they will be cheap—you can go down along the banks of the Potomac River, where some corporation under this bill has developed power, at the cost of the destruction of a bridge perhaps, or at the cost of the ruination of the Lincoln Memorial, and fill that bottle full of electricity, take it home, put it in your basement, and light your house for six months.

There is no end to the possibilities that may come. It is because of the wonderful possibilities that are just ahead that this is an important proposition; and that is the reason why I feel that it is a duty here to plead with Senators not to take away, by the provisions of this bill as it is now drafted, all possibility of the enjoyment of those benefits that should come to those who shall follow us, and give them away to corporations and water-power trusts, without any compensation and without any recompense.

Why, we have had a great many reports here from various departments showing how the water-power business is interlocked, the same as all other business; how it is connected up with financial interests in Wall Street; and at these hearings we have had men from all over the country, interested in great financial institutions, begging Congress to pass a bill similar to the one that has been introduced here. I am not finding fault with these gentlemen, but they are not here for philanthropic purposes. They are here for an honorable purpose, I concede. They are fine gentlemen, as a rule, as far as I know. I know of no exceptions. But, Mr. President, they are asking us to give to them and to their clients rights and privileges that we ought jealously to preserve for all of the people of the United States. Even though the improvement suggested by the Senator from Utah does not come, even though we go no further than we have gone now, why should we not conserve these rights while we have the power to do so by giving to the officials of the Government a power of regulation?

The Senator said: "Oh, any charge that is made for horsepower developed is going to be taken out of the consumer." I gave the other day, I think, a good many illustrations showing why that would not be true. In any case where it would be true, then the tax ought to be nominal only. But suppose we take one of the illustrations I have given, that of a man building a gristmill. Suppose he makes fertilizer out of the air. Is there any State body that has the power to regulate it? Suppose he makes flour. Suppose he grinds up wheat and puts flour on the market. Will the public-utility commission of the State where it is located fix the price of his flour? Will it not go out into competition with all other flour? And if he can get his power so cheaply that he can make a huge profit above those with whom he comes in competition who have to depend on other kinds of power, why should not we, on behalf of the people of the United States, compel him to pay a charge for that privilege—not high enough to keep him out of the business, not high enough to prevent him from cutting under the other fellow, even, but enough so that of the huge profit that would be made in that kind of a case those who own the site, the people of the country, shall get a part?

Mr. President, it may be said that in this amendment I am striking out language that gives the Secretary the right to consider the business of the grantee. The language I want to strike out is this:

> And in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation as well as to the business of said grantee.

That language, "as well as to the business of said grantee," is of no more effect in here than the flowers than bloom in the springtime, because just ahead of that we have absolutely fixed the maximum amount that can be charged to the grantee. That maximum amount is a charge of the value of the land as land, and you can not go any higher. That is the extreme limit. So that language means nothing, amounts to nothing; but the other language that I seek to strike out does mean something. It is an absolute direction to the Secretary of War that he shall offset against the damages that he has found as the value of the land, as land, any benefits that may accrue to the public.

Mr. President, it is said—and the question was asked me by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]—"Will we ever have a Secretary of War who would do things of that kind?" For the sake of argument, let us admit, first, that we will not; and I hope we will not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator passes to that subject I should like to say that I was a little bit surprised to hear the Senator from Nebraska apparently admit that in granting permission to construct a dam in a navigable stream the Government could not make it a condition of the grant that the Government could regulate or fix the price of the power generated or the commodity created, whatever it might be. I know that it is a somewhat disputed proposition, but I have not been willing to admit that the United States could not make it a part of its contract with the permittee that the Congress of the United States could, by proper regulation, control the price.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Iowa has evidently misunderstood me, or else I have not been very apt in the use of the language. I have said that under this bill that could not be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that, Mr. President. There is nothing in this bill to enable him to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I say. I am discussing it as though this bill were the law. I believe Congress has the authority, and I believe we ought to exercise it, to give to the Secretary of War or any other public official that we empower to make these leases authority to demand a charge. I do not doubt at all that we can put any authority of that kind in the bill that we see fit; and I do not believe even those who deny its constitutionality believe it when they get down to the bottom of it, because if they did they would not object to any provision of that kind, because it would not amount to anything if it was unconstitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator still misunderstands me. I do not mean the charge that shall be made for the use of the property. I mean that the Government can be clothed with authority to regulate the price of the service rendered by the corporation to which the permission is given.

Mr. NORRIS. So do I. I agree to that fully. I have never intentionally said anything to the contrary; but this bill does not give him that authority. If this bill is passed, there will be no charge excepting the charge contained in this very provision that I am discussing, and I think I have demonstrated that that will always be nothing. If this provision is not changed, I want to assert now that in my judgment there never will be a single dam built on a navigable stream where the Government of the United States will get one cent for any land that may be taken, whether it is Potomac Park, whether it is the Capitol Grounds, whether it is the abutment of the Potomac River bridge, or whether it is part of the public property of the United States in any city in the United States; because, in the first place, the maximum amount that could be assessed would be the value of the land taken as land, and then they would offset against that whatever improvement might have been made in the navigation of the stream.

When the Senator from Iowa interrupted me I was about to discuss the suggestion that came to me when the Senator from Tennessee asked me the question whether I thought the Secretary of War would do this. Suppose we admit, for argument's sake, that we never will have a Secretary of War that will do such a thing. Is that any reason why we should give him the power to do it if he wants to? Why should we give him a power that nobody ever wants him to exercise? Why should we say to the Secretary of War in this bill, "You can practically confiscate any property of the United States that is within reach of a navigable stream, but we hope you will not do it"? What kind of a position is the Congress of the United States in when it passes a law that every honest man hopes never will be put into force? If we do not want the Secretary of War to do that, then why give him the power to do it?

But let us see, Mr. President. Perhaps we never would have a Secretary of War that would go so far as I have indicated, but we will have many and many a Secretary of War who will go a great deal further than any honest citizen will want him to go, and he may do so honestly; and I would not impute any dishonesty to the President who appointed him, either. He might be entirely innocent. But suppose the development spoken of by the Senator from Utah should come about. Everybody believes there will be improvement in electricity; but even if there is not, if it stands as it is to-day, and we pass this bill as it is now without amendment, and the great water-power interests, connected up with the financial interests through interlocking directories, start in to build dams and make electricity, there will be millions and millions of profit in it, and if this bill is not changed and any man or any corporation gets a right under this bill it will, in my judgment, for all practical purposes, be in perpetuity. That will invite men with millions, men with influences in every nook and corner of the United States, to enter into a grand rush to get possession of the navigable streams.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Was the Senator in the Chamber yesterday when the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who favors this bill, admitted that this meant practically perpetual franchises?

Mr. NORRIS. I was not in the Chamber, but I understand he made that admission.

Mr. KENYON. He did make that admission, and I think the Senator will agree that that is true under this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. KENYON. It would be just as well to say so as to surround it with this kind of language, which means the same thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so. Now, I understand some other Senators do not agree with that. They may be perfectly honest in it. When the time comes we will discuss that. That will come in section 6. I have an amendment to strike it out and put in a different section, and I am going into it at that time. It is sufficient now for me to say that, in my judgment, that is what the bill means—a right in perpetuity; and that is a long time, Senators. It will be a good while. We are giving away rights that will exist a good while after we are gone and forgotten. That might be true if we did not give them for longer than 50 years, for all I know, and probably would, for most of us.

But when I was interrupted by the Senator from Iowa I was speaking about the great power of those that would be interested in the development of navigable streams if they had to pay nothing and got rights in perpetuity, and their influence over the United States. How long will it be before they will be nominating Presidents? How long will it be before they will be financing presidential campaigns? To get the right kind of a Secretary of War would be the only thing they would want, and that is not much to ask of an incoming administration. It would not be done by saying to the President, "Here, we want this man appointed as Secretary because we own him." Everybody knows they would not take that course; but from every congressional district, from every State, would come influences through the Representatives, through the Senators, through chairmen of political committees, recommending this or that man to be appointed by the incoming President as Secretary of War; and the President would, perhaps, innocently make the appointment.

It is said that the President could remove him, which is true; but all these things would not be done at once. They would not start out in the open and let the people know what they were doing. They would do it at a time like the present, when the entire country is thinking about war, or at some other time when the public mind was completely taken up with the consideration of some all-absorbing subject.

The people of the United States are not thinking about water power now. We can take away every right they possess and they will not find it out for a long time. All the people in the eastern half of the United States are praying every night, before they go to bed, that God will protect them from capture before morning by the Germans; and over in California they are scaring the little children to sleep with the idea that the Japs will get them "if they don't watch out." We are talking about militarism. The entire country is worked up about military preparedness, and, like the Senate of the United States, they are not paying much attention to water-power development—because I am talking now to practically empty seats. Senators have no interest in it; the people have not any interest in it; and that is the kind of a time when the unseen Government gets in its work. While we scare the people of one section of the country with some hullabaloo, and the people of some other section with some other imaginary thing, and while they have ceased to watch, the special interests will steal the platter clean. This bill gives them an opportunity to do it; and if we pass this bill without amendment, in my humble judgment, we will find that these valuable rights belonging to posterity will have been frittered away for a song, and the song not sung.

Mr. President, it seems to me it comes down to this proposition: We have gone so far in this bill as to decide that any man who gets a water-power right here will have to pay nothing unless he takes some Government land, and if he takes any Government land he will only have to pay what it is worth as land; and then offset against that, that if he improves navigation he will get credit for the value of such improvement. The result is that in no case will anybody pay anything. The power of regulation, the power of control, is absolutely gone, turned over to private corporations, without any string tied to it, for them to enjoy now and forever.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that the cost of these improvements to the private corporation, amounting to perhaps millions of dollars, directly for the benefit of the Government in improving navigation, is some compensation that the Government gets?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator further recognize that notwithstanding what control the Government might be entitled to, and I think it is entitled to none so far as regulation is concerned because the Government does not own the water—it has no right to control it in that respect—does not the Senator recognize that we have public-utility commissions in every State in the Union, and that consequently wherever these plants are located they are subject to be controlled as to rates and service, and that the people of the communities have a more direct interest in having cheap rates than has the Government of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, I have gone over the rate question fully before when I think the Senator was not here. Of course I do not agree with him at all. I do not want to levy a charge where that charge would be added to what the consumer has to pay, and I have given many illustrations—I do not think the Senator would expect me to go over them again now—where, in my judgment, it would not apply at all. A day or two ago I read from the Secretary of the Interior showing where I think he illustrates and demonstrates that in some cases there ought to be practically no charge whatever and in other cases there ought to be a stiff charge.

The Senator has used the old argument that there are utility commissions to regulate charges. Mr. President, there are a good many reasons why we should not submit to the regulation of utility corporations if we can retain in the Federal Government the power to regulate also. In the first place, the public utility commissions often do not regulate. They have one in Washington which has been in force and in office for several years, and they have not regulated anything yet. It may be that they will some time. I have faith in them. I think they are earnest, honest men; but the report, for instance, of the gas company, as it was shown here on the floor of the Senate, made a per cent running as high as 50 and 60 per cent upon the actual cash capital paid in in dividends, and a mathematical demonstration was made here on the floor of the Sente that from their own report, taking their own figures a year or so ago, if a reduction had been made of gas to 70 cents they would still have made, as I remember it, somewhere between 12 and 15 per cent upon a capitalization one-half of which was water. There is no regulation about it. We can not get it through the Senate, because it is subject to a point of order. Any bill introduced on that subject goes to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and they do not meet——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there a commission in the District of Columbia that has the power to reduce rates?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. That is always offered as an excuse when any bill is presented to reduce rates.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not certain, but I think it lies in Congress to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. It lies in Congress; there is not any doubt about that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If it lies in Congress——

Mr. NORRIS. Congress provided for a commission and gave it authority to regulate rates.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; and if Congress will not reduce these rates, you had better say that it is harder to get Congress to move in the line of the people than would be commissions that are appointed, at least in my State.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know. I am not criticizing any commission, as far as I am concerned. I do say that often they do not regulate, and I have given an illustration of what I believe to be a good commission that has not so far regulated. But the Senator says they will always regulate. Suppose the Senator from Colorado and myself organized a corporation, after this bill is passed, and we went over here on a river that is navigable and built a dam there under this law to make flour. We have a right to do that. The Secretary of War has the right to give us that privilege. We put up a gristmill. We make flour. Does the Senator know of any public-utility commission that will fix the price of that flour for us? Does he know of any utility commission in any State of the Union that would tell us how much we had to charge for the flour when we made it? Would not that flour come in competition and sell as best it could, according to its merits and the supply and the demand of the market? If we could make 100 per cent, would we not do it?

Suppose we entered another navigable stream and organized another corporation. We wanted to make nitrate. That is something that is talked about a good deal now. We invested a whole lot of money and made nitrate. Where is there a public utility commission that would regulate it? Is there any? I wish some Senator would point it out if there is. Who would tell us what we would have to ask for our nitrate? Would we not sell it for every dollar we could get? We come in competition with other nitrate producers and dealers, and the price would be fixed according to that, and if we were able to make 100 per cent we would be justified in doing it.

Now, would it not be better to give to the Secretary of War the right to say, if you are going to produce this product or that product and will sell it for a certain price the charge will be practically nothing; if you are going to keep the price away up, then the charge is going to be greater? Of course, under this bill that could not be done, because, as I said awhile ago, the limitation is fixed on the value of the land that is taken. He has no authority to charge us anything if we do not take any of Uncle Sam's property, and when we take Uncle Sam's property he gives that to us, only you have to go through a roundabout way to have it accomplished.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator says that a man manufactures flour and the public-utility commission can not regulate the price of flour. That is true. We have a system in this country of letting private competition control in regard to that. If you make the means of getting these water-power sites too costly you will find that it will be reflected in the price of flour.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, that is true. I admit that. I agree with the Senator fully.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me call the attention of the Senator to our theory of government. It is that when a man manufactures something for private consumption not the subject of a public utility the Government must rely upon the individuals to make competition, and the more water-power plants there are to turn gristmills the cheaper flour will be.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They will compete with each other and thereby produce the low price of flour. If that will not do it and monopoly still exists, coal can be used in the turning of the wheels by steam, and thereby it will produce. Consequently the imagination which the Senator has is met by the fact that the people compete with each other and thereby the price of flour will be reasonable.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's argument is logical, then it is an argument against any public-utility corporation or any regulation by law of anything in any place by anybody.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. What is your public-utility corporation for? Why not say, in the Senator's own words, we are going to come into competition with others; it will regulate itself. We know that combinations of men and of corporations increase prices unreasonably, and that they place burdens which are unreasonable upon the backs of the consumers in all products, if they get a chance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; those combinations ought to be prohibited, and they are prohibited. They should be prosecuted if combinations are formed in restraint of trade, and they will be. So far as the control of public utilities is concerned, the public-utility commissions of the United States are doing most wholesome work in every respect, much more so than the Federal Government is attempting to do. Take the railroad question that was up. The Senator knows that the State of Kansas passed a 2-cent law. I think the State of Nebraska did that. They are attempting to urge it; but we have not found any action on the part of the United States Government that has a tendency in that direction. The truth of the matter is that the State legislatures and the State officers are nearer to the people who are to pay for these things than is Congress, and consequently they will guard the interests of the people better than could be done by acts of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. As I said before, I have not anything to say against State utility corporations and commissions. They have done a great deal of good. I would not abolish them by any means. But that is not any reason why when we have the power, because we own the land upon which the dam is to be built, we should not hold the hand of regulation over them and prevent monopoly and extortion.

I think I have fully answered the Senator's suggestion from the fact that the powers granted under this bill will be utilized lots of times to make things over which the public-utility corporations will have nothing whatever to do, and in cases where they do they will circumvent them in various ways. If we were going to organize a corporation to sell electricity, we would probably organize a corporation to build a dam. We would organize another corporation to build transmission lines, and then perhaps we would lease that transmission line to another corporation, and that corporation would buy electricity at the dam, and they would take it to some other place, to some city or in the vicinity of some city, and sell it to some other corporation which would distribute it. In the meantime they may have to cross a State line. The corporation that was to be regulated in the Senator's State would have to buy electricity, perhaps, over in another State, and this utility corporation could not regulate the one over in the other State. They would not fix the price at which they might sell it. Perhaps that corporation would by its electricity of another corporation in still another State, and so you would go.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But that can be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it can. All those things can be done, but they are hardly practicable. We have the power here at the very inception, right where the power is made, to say to the man, "We are going to see that no useless middlemen have their corporations organized here, and that you are dealing right with the consumers of this electricity that you develop on our land," and I think we ought to do it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that the charge which the Government might make of anything especially above the value of that which the enterprise receives is going to be reflected in the rates that are to be charged upon the consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. I have conceded all the time——

Mr. SHAFROTH. If you concede that——

Mr. NORRIS. Allow me; wait until I answer the Senator. I say I have conceded all the time that you could make a charge that would be so great that that would be the case, and in any case like that you ought not to make the charge.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, does not the Senator concede this also, that wherever there is a charge against the initial undertaking, in the nature of a rental or anything of that kind, it is not only reflected in the charge to the consumer but it multiplies three or four times before it reaches the consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is often the case.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If that is the case, is it not better not to have that charge, and let the utility commission take and control that matter so as to save to the consumer three-fourths of the amount which he has to pay otherwise?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has assumed something that I have admitted, and then he begins an argument on it. If you take the assumption then his argument is good. I do not want to apply it in that kind of a case. If I had my way in this bill the Secretary of War would not apply it in that kind of a case. I have conceded, and I think every man who has studied the subject will concede, that you could make a charge that would necessarily have to be reflected upon the consumer, and whenever that time comes you must not make the charge. Suppose we have a corporation under this bill after it becomes a law developing electricity, and the bill has been changed so that the Secretary of War has a right to levy the charge for the power development. He finds out what it costs. He knows just as they do exactly to the cent how much it costs them per horsepower, how much they have actually expended. Let us say it has cost them $50 per horsepower. They are selling it to another corporation at $75 per horsepower. That is the cost to the second corporation. That is an enormous profit. It is an outrageous profit. But they can sell it for $75 per horsepower, and I do not blame them for doing it. We would all sell it for all we could get. The Secretary of War says, "I have the authority," and if the bill has been changed, he says, "Gentlemen, you are making a profit of $25 per horsepower. I am going to charge you to be paid into the Treasury of the United States $5 per horsepower." Would they charge any more to the other fellow? They will get $75 just the same, but instead of making a profit of $25 per horsepower they would be making a profit of $20. Then the Secretary of War would say to them, "If you will sell that to this community," or whatever it might be, "for $55 per horsepower, I will not charge you anything." He could raise the price on them as long as they kept up the price and lower the price if they would lower their selling price. That is the power I want the Secretary of War to have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator please, would it not be much better instead of the $5 being paid into the Treasury of the United States that the consumer himself under a rule of the utility commission should say you shall not charge more than so much for your electricity?

Mr. NORRIS. All right, let us take that case. Suppose the utility commission says that; but suppose the power that is developed in this case is in the State of Wyoming, let us say, and the corporation that is buying it of me is in Colorado. The public-utility commission of Wyoming does not care a cent when I sell my power in Colorado how much I get for it, and the Public Utility Commission of Colorado has not any jurisdiction over me, and the consumers are entirely helpless.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then they can go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORRIS. That is another roundabout way. There is always a possibility of doing it in a different way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is the direct way.

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary of War here, representing the strong hand of the Federal Government, starting right at the beginning, over whose decision there can be no litigation, over whose management there can not be troubles and trials that will go into court and travel from year to year their tedious way, is able at the very beginning, through the lease he has made, to say to these people, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is just the reason——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me yield to the Senator from South Dakota. He rose some time ago.

Mr. STERLING. Is not this a consideration which may, in part, answer the Senator from Colorado, namely, that it is upon the public domain that these improvements and developments are to be made, and the public domain belongs to the people of the United States and they have a right to share in any proceeds therefrom. Is it anything more than fair that the people of a particular community having the benefit should pay some additional charge on that account, because the whole people have an interest in the public domain? Is there anything wrong about that? Suppose that the charge is an added charge to the consumer, have not the people as a whole a right to some little share in the proceeds?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; they have a right to do that, I will say, and legally and morally there would be nothing wrong about doing it; but, if I were managing it and the power were developed, if I had my way in framing the law, and the privilege was given directly to a municipality or to a State or to a county where there were no intermediate corporations to get a rake-off, I would be perfectly willing to donate the site, the land, and everything that the Government has in it if the people of the community were to get the full benefit of it, but we ought all the while to reserve the power, as we have the right, to enact in the law that we shall demand and receive a rental, if we want to do it.

Mr. President, just a moment in regard to the particular amendment. The discussion has taken somewhat of a general scope, and before I close I want to get back to the amendment itself. At the risk of repeating, I want very briefly to appeal to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] that now, since we have decided that the only place in this proposed law where any fee shall be paid to the Government is limited and cut down to the actual value of the land as land that is taken for the construction of the dam or other accessory works, why not at least stop there, without going further, and saying that as against this small sum you will have to offset the benefits to navigation and thus wipe it out.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I want to get at just the point the Senator from Nebraska is making, though I think I understand it. Suppose this permit was granted, that certain land had to be taken, and that the water actually passed over the land taken, the land belonging to the Government. As I understand, not only would the land be taken, but a sufficient amount of benefits could be taken into consideration to wipe out the value of the land, so that the Government land would be gone with absolutely nothing paid for it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the practical operation of it; yes.

Mr. KENYON. It is the question that the Senator is presenting in this bill at this time. I suppose the Senator expects to have a yea-and-nay vote on that subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I want to have such a vote.

Mr. KENYON. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I am very much in favor of his amendment. I wish there could be more Senators present to hear what the Senator has to say, and then we could perhaps have more votes for his amendment.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just one word before the Senator concludes. I desire to ask a question in regard to the construction of that part of the bill which he proposes to strike out. Do I understand the Senator to think that the clause "and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation" is not to be taken as in any way affecting the value of the land so far as fixing the charges are concerned, or is that an element now to be considered in fixing the value of the land?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I take that language to mean—and I can not conceive of any other construction that can be put upon it—that it has nothing to do with fixing the value of the land; but that, after the value of the land is fixed according to the rule laid down, which is as land, then there can be offset against that——

Mr. STERLING. That can be deducted from the value of the land in fixing the charges?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; and everybody knows that it will be a larger sum in every case, I presume, than will ever arise than will be the value of the land, according to the rule laid down. So there will be nothing to pay.

Mr. STERLING. Exactly; and applying the same principle of construction, would the Senator not apply it to the last clause of the paragraph, which reads as follows:

> As well as to the business of said grantee.

That, then, would not be considered as an element in increasing the value of the land for the purpose of the charge?

Mr. NORRIS. No. In other words, if we can conceive of a case where they would build a dam without improving navigation at all, that would be the case where the maximum would have to be paid; that would be the value of the land as land.

Mr. STERLING. And, as I understand, it has not been contended by the proponents of this bill otherwise, has it?

Mr. NORRIS. So far that particular clause, I think, has not been argued by the Senator from Tennessee or by any other member of the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that the friends of this bill do not agree with the Senator from Nebraska at all. The Senator has consumed all the time since he offered his amendment, and the friends of the bill have had no opportunity to express their opinion of it.

Mr. STERLING. Just one further question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Nebraska is familiar with the provision in regard to charges in the general water-power bill, which has been reported to the Senate; that is, the power bill relating to nonnavigable waters?

Mr. NORRIS. I am somewhat familiar with it; yes.

Mr. STERLING. I call the Senator's attention to this provision in that bill:

> The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for all land leased, which charges or rentals may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be measured by the power developed and sold or used by the lessee for any purpose other than the operation of the plant.

I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if striking out the words "based upon its value as land" and inserting some such provision in the pending bill as I have just read from the general water-power bill would be satisfactory?

Mr. NORRIS. It would. Of course the particular language the Senator say: he would strike out was the language——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment—was the language included in the amendment of the Senator from Montana? He sought to strike that out, and that was voted down. I like the provision to which the Senator refers in the bill that comes from the Committee on Public Lands, referring to nonnavigable streams on public lands. I myself agree to that proposition, and think it is a fair statement of what ought to be the law.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator will recall that in the discussion before the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate much time was spent upon that particular provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; a great deal of time.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I merely wish to say, as the Senator from Nebraska has already said, that the proposition now made has been voted down twice in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean the proposition contained in my amendment now pending?

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator refers to the one referred to by the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the provision standing alone has been voted down; that is, my proposed amendment to strike out that provision has been voted down.

Mr. SHIELDS. Amendments proposing to impose a Federal charge upon the water power have been twice rejected.

Mr. STERLING. The amendment I suggested, however, was coupled with the other provision fixing the charges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays, unless the Senator from Tennessee desires to address the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to say a few words.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Tennessee will excuse me, I will ask for the yeas and nays, and then the Senator can proceed. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I decline to go into a general discussion of the bill in answer to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Quite a number of the points he has dwelt upon have already been very elaborately discussed, and the others will be discussed in connection with other amendments. What I have to say will be confined to the amendment now being considered by the Senate.

The provision which he proposes to strike out follows that requiring the charges made by the Secretary for land occupied to and for its value as land. It is in these words:

> And in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such land to the interests of navigation as well as to the business of said grantee.

This expresses practically the rule that applies to a condemnation proceeding. Where, under the power of eminent domain, private property is taken for a public purpose the land is to be valued as land and all incidental damages are to be given to the landowner, and all incidental benefits are to be charged to him. That is the rule in all the States. No court, so far as I can remember, has ever allowed such benefits as accrue to property in general in the neighborhood from the improvement, but benefit must be to the particular land taken. That rule would be followed by the Secretary under the direction that is given him in fixing these charges.

Mr. President, I do not think anyone would say that a company which constructs at its own expense a dam according to the plans and specifications required and approved by the Secretary of War, with locks and other facilities that may be required, and maintains them at its own expense, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river, a duty incumbent upon the Government of the United States, that the United States should charge for some public land that may be taken and used for flowage or other purposes, that being the only expense required of it in an improvement that may cost many million dollars.

I again refer to the case in my own State of the Hales Bar Dam, where Mr. Brady constructed a dam at an expense of $9,000,000, with all locks and navigation facilities, which furnished slack-water navigation for 35 miles. Would it have been just, if there happened to be any public land overflowed by that dam, for the United States to have charged Mr. Brady for it? Certainly not. That is the question presented by the amendment proposed, and I hope it will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness in his family, and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I now desire to offer an amendment which contemplates the excision from this bill of a feature of it which, in my judgment, is utterly indefensible.

I invite your special attention to the sentence on page 7, commencing at line 6. I read from that line down to line 12, as follows:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region.

The word "region," Mr. President, is a term signifying an area of country of indefinite extent. Its bounds may be large or small. Thus we speak of New England as a region; we speak of the South as a region; we speak of the Mississippi Valley as a region; we frequently speak of the Rocky Mountain region; we speak of the Pacific coast region.

I am not going to spend any time in the discussion of this amendment. I hope to expedite the disposition of the amendments offered by me and speed the final consideration of this measure. I am confident that one who will not be convinced by the bare reading of this amendment will not be convinced by any argument, however persuasive it may be.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not get the scope of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I have not yet indicated it.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. Let us assume that New England is a region. An opportunity is presented to construct a dam across the Connecticut River. A gentleman associates with himself a number of other gentlemen, and they have command of all of the capital necessary for the construction of that dam and to conduct the development which is contemplated. We will say that it will take $5,000,000. They have the $5,000,000 ready to put into that development, and they want the permit, but they are met with another applicant for the permit who can command $100,000,000 and who is capable of developing all the water resources of the entire New England region. There is a contest between these two applicants. The bill forces the Secretary of War to turn down the application of the man who is able to develop only the one power site and compels him to give the permit to the great, big, monstrous corporation that desires to develop and has the capacity to develop all the water resources of the region.

The Southern Appalachian country is sometimes spoken of as a region. The Southern Water Power Co. has conducted many water-power developments in that country. I presume, in all reasonable probability, if that company were competing with any other company for a privilege in that region, it could justly say, "We are able to utilize speedily, and to bring to their highest development, all the water-power resources of the Southern Appalachian region."

I had occasion, in the course of some remarks I made the other day, to extol the administration of the business of the Montana Water Power Co. in my State. I desire now to add my testimonial to what was then said as to the great work that it has done in my State in the development of water powers and the utilization of our water-power resources. But, Mr. President, if some other concern wants a permit to conduct a water-power development in my State, and has command of only enough resources to enable it to conduct that one water-power development, I do not want to have the Secretary of War forced to give the permit to the Montana Water Power Co. I want to have it get an even show.

So I move, Mr. President, that the bill be amended by striking out the following language, commencing with the word "that," in line 10, the remainder of that line, and all of lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, reading as follows:

> That applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region; and as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in such respect, then preference shall be given to——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the lines from 13 to 17, inclusive:

> And as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in that respect, then preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

That language is even more objectionable to me than that which is pointed out by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that I have an amendment addressed to the later language which presents another question; but the amendment which I now propose will make an immediate connection between what goes before and the feature to which the Senator from West Virginia is now adverting.

Mr. CHILTON. Would not the whole question be brought before the Senate by a motion to strike out all from lines 1 to 17, inclusive?

Mr. WALSH. No; I think not. I think that would present three or four different questions.

Mr. JAMES. It is best to vote on them separately, so that we can get at each one.

Mr. CHILTON. All right; just as the Senator sees fit.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana has failed to give this bill the proper consideration, or he would not propose this amendment, nor would he put upon the language which he moves to strike out the construction stated.

The words he proposes to strike out are:

Preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region.

Evidently, from his remarks, the Senator is under the apprehension that there lurks in those words a provision for a giant monopoly. The Senator is unduly alarmed. Evidently he thinks the word "region" is intended to cover a group of States, or perhaps the whole United States. The word "region" is defined in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary as follows:

1. A direction; a boundary-line; one of the grand districts or quarters into which any space or surface, as of the earth or the heavens, is conceived of as divided; hence, in general, a portion of space or territory of indefinite extent; country; province; district; tract.
2. Tract, part, or space, lying about and including anything; neighborhood; vicinity; sphere.

Any of these definitions may be conveyed by the word region, as shown by the subject matter and by the context. The meaning of the word in this bill is the particular district where the river or the proposed improvement is situated.

The framers of this bill and the members of the committee are as much astonished as anyone could be that the Senator should think this word "region" was intended to apply to the whole Appalachian country. The Senator fails to consider the context and remember that the bill merely provides for the construction of a certain dam or dams in a river, and that the word "region" is thereby limited.

This provision is to secure the best and most comprehensive development of the water power of any particular territory or district. If the Senator is so fearful of the word "region," I have no objection if it be limited by placing before it the word "particular" or "immediate," or even substituting for it the word "district."

The fact that a company has a large capital and makes an extensive development does not make it a trust or a monopoly. The development of water power requires the investment of large sums of money. The developments which have been made have cost from one million to thirty million dollars, and there are many projects the construction of which will require similar sums of money.

It is now generally agreed that in order to get the best possible results in water-power development it is necessary to consolidate or couple up the power afforded by different dams and different streams located in the same region or district. This is the opinion of nearly all public officials and engineers who have had occasion to study the water-power problem.

George Otis Smith, the Director of the Geological Survey, in a recent article written by him upon this subject, said:

It is this logical desire for the best use, in which the largest possible number may share, that makes the utilization of water power a live issue. Unwarranted fear of impending monopoly may have led some to urge a halt in all development, while blind disregard of a changing order of things has caused others to denounce any restriction. The practical observer of the times, however, recognizes a greater danger of monopoly because of nondevelopment and a larger security through regulation.

The engineering fact that stands out in the utilization of water power is the comparatively high efficiency of large systems. Lower costs of operation and better service are results that appear to follow naturally the creation of these combinations of power plants.

The combination of several water powers, differing in character in order to serve many markets having diversified service requirements, makes possible an economic adjustment of supply to demand, and thus the result is a natural tendency to State wide and even interstate units of operation. Nature's irregularities are thus equalized and man's varied requirements are similarly balanced. The Western States, in which these large hydroelectric systems have been mainly developed, show the largest per capita consumption of power and the lowest average rates. The centralization of power development is accompanied by a large market and diversified use; and the resulting high-load factor has made possible low rates, which in turn have encouraged the more general use of power, until in a State like Montana, which leads in per capita consumption, the people put electric energy to every use on the ranch and in the home, while in the mines and smelters and on the railroads electricity is displacing steam. The influence of this cheaper power on the mining industry, for instance, can be realized in part by considering the fact that one mining company, by substituting hydroelectric power for steam, effected an annual saving of nearly $2,000,000. Translated into terms of copper ore, this means a saving of about 50 cents on a ton of ore, thus permitting the mining, with an equal profit, of ore that much lower in grade than could be mined when steam-generated power was used.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHIELDS. Not now. I will finish reading and then I will be glad to yield.

The Director of the Geological Survey continues:

This illustrates the wide public interest that may be served through the efficient operation of large units. Conservation of this sort means much to the whole Nation.

I will read from the hearings of the committee on the development and control of water power before the National Waterway Commission. I am going to read from the evidence given by the then Secretary of the Interior, Walter L. Fisher. Secretary Fisher then said:

I do not think there should be any provisions in these grants against so-called combinations or monopolies, but do believe there should be no assignment of the grant without the permission of the Government. I think hydroelectric development is essentially monopolistic and should be essentially monopolistic in its character. That is why I think it should be effectively regulated. I think they should have the advantages of the control of the market and freedom from harassing and vexatious competition if we are going to put them under the disadvantages of effective public regulation.

This bill, I may say, does not conform to the views of Secretary Fisher in that respect, because it contains a provision against monopolies and conspiracies against trade.

Mr. Fisher again said:

I would allow the executive officer to consent to or to reject the assignment. All I ask is that the grantee come in and present his case, and that we know there is a proper assignment made. Public interest may be conserved by an assignment if it is a good thing and we can consent. One great advantage would be to prevent public misinformation on the whole question. A large part of the public thinks the way to redress the evils is by preventing monopoly, but the more intelligent portion of the public seem to think the proper way is to recognize that water powers are essentially monopolistic in character and to provide effective regulation. I do not think it is fair to put on the grantee the burden of effective regulation without giving them the advantages that go with that theory.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIELDS. I prefer to finish my quotations, and will then gladly yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, Commissioner of Corporations, in the report on water-power development in the United States made by him in 1912, has this to say upon the concentration of water-power development:

In addition to this fluctuation in the demand there is also a variation in the supply of water power available. This is due to the fluctuating flow of streams. The flow varies according to the location and character of the drainage basin and according to seasons, and the seasons themselves, of course, vary in different years. A water-power installation therefore must also take these factors into account. If the installation provides only for utilizing the minimum flow, there must be a tremendous waste of energy during the period of larger flow. On the other hand, as already stated, it is impracticable to install power up to the maximum potentially available.

Remedy for variations in supply and demand for power. The problem of a power producer is to meet these varying conditions of demand and supply in the most economical way. There are several means contributing to this end.

The physical effect of irregularity in the flow of streams can be partly overcome by storage. In no case, however, can storage give a stream anything like the power represented by its maximum flow. The amount of storage practicable depends upon the topography of the country and upon the value of the lands overflowed. Up to this time very little progress has been made in storage development.

Aside from storage it is possible to accomplish something by "pondage"—that is, the accumulation of water from day to day in power-dam ponds during that portion of the day when the demand is smallest.

A more effective remedy is in "coupling up" into one unit two or more sites accessible to the same markets. In practically all cases some of the developments can cease operations when the highest demand is over and accumulate pondage, to be brought into use at the period of highest demand the next day. In the meantime the other sites can meet the diminished demand.

The variableness of power supply and power demand, however, can not be entirely cured, even by storage, pondage, and "coupling."

The effective remedy is the use of auxiliary steam plants. In nearly all cases hydraulic concerns must provide sufficient steam auxiliaries to meet variations not otherwise met.

And, on page 95 of the same report, Mr. Smith said:

In addition to the general tendency toward concentration in the ownership of public utilities and industrial enterprises that are, in the case of water power, special forces contributing to this end. It was pointed out in a previous chapter that the highest efficiency and economy in the utilization of water power often requires the unifying of development. Such unification or "coupling up" of power developments results in concentration of ownership or, at least, harmony in control.

The development of large water powers usually costs more than the requirements of the average manufacturer will justify as an investment for power. Consequently only the smaller sites can generally be utilized by individual manufacturing concerns. The advance of electrical science has made it possible to use power at a distance from the point of generation, and so has greatly extended the area that may be served from a given power site. These conditions have given rise to the "commercial" development and distribution of water power in the form of electricity and have made it probable that developments at most of the larger power sites must become commercial projects. The advantages of coupling up sites and the consequent enlargement of power units greatly increase the costs of a system of developments, and in most cases an aggregation of capital is necessary.

Again, on page 205 of the same report, he said:

The advantages of "coupling up" have already been described in detail, both in uniting adjacent water powers and in tying together adjacent power markets, so as to obtain the nearest possible approach both to a steady level of supply and to a steady level of demand. Obviously, a power system that can use a number of different power sites to supplement and aid each other, and that also can, by control of the market, more or less adjust demand to the variations in supply, will most efficiently utilize this resource, from a technical or engineering standpoint. In other words, the power can be produced and delivered for use at a lower average cost per unit in this manner, and with less waste.

Mr. President, I am going to read from a statement made by Mr. Gano Dunn, president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, before the National Waterways Commission. While speaking on this subject Mr. Dunn said:

It has been suggested that with the growth in extent of large hydro-electric-distributing systems ultimate interconnections and combinations between them might establish a monopoly and permit the raising of prices for power. Such interconnection between contiguous hydro-electric systems offers decided and important engineering advantages. It improves constancy of electrical pressure and enables the system to draw power from two or more independent power plants.

The rainfall occurring at different times on two or more separate watersheds is thus made to benefit all of the consumers on the combined systems. Such interconnection also permits reduction in operating expenses and assures better service by reducing to a minimum the probability of total interruptions at any time from line troubles or otherwise. The investment and, consequently, the cost of power can be reduced by combinations, because less capacity in generating machinery to serve as spare plant for emergencies need be installed, and operating expenses can be reduced by rendering repairs easier, owing to greater facilities for shutting down for work or for inspection. Any tendency toward raising the price of power as an accompaniment of such combination is restrained automatically by competition with steam power and can be regulated by Government commission.

Another gentleman appeared before that committee after Mr. Dunn and testified. He was Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and I want to read briefly from his testimony in regard to this question. Mr. Pinchot said:

I am very strongly in favor of the consolidation of water-power plants, coupling them up over large areas. The argument made for that consolidation in the brief submitted by Mr. Dunn on behalf of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers is absolutely unanswerable, and I have long held the same opinion. Better service to the community would be forthcoming if water-power companies operated over large areas. But there must be public control of their operations to prevent the benefits which come by reason of such consolidation from being translated into a general overcharge on the consumer.

Mr. President, regulation of rates is provided for in this bill in the strictest manner.

I will now read from the recent report of the Secretary of Agriculture upon the subject:

Monopolization of the supply in any given territory makes possible, through interconnection of stations and through diversification of load, economies of operation that would not be possible for isolated independent stations. Interruptions to service might be lessened, the needs of the customer may be better served, and rates may be lower with a single power system than with several. No better service is given and no lower rates charged than in California, where, notwithstanding the considerable municipal developments, 90 per cent of the total primary power is used by public-service corporations, or in Montana, where 89 per cent is owned by two affiliated corporations. Having the ability to give the better service and the lower rate, it only remains for the proper public agency to require it.

It has been repeatedly stated during this discussion, Mr. President, that Montana has the greatest development of electricity of any State or perhaps any nation in the world. I understand that the character of development proposed in this provision of the bill is in operation in that State. Practically the total water power of that State not upon the public domain has been developed, and the companies controlling it, with the power controlled by each company, are as follows:

	Horsepower.
Montana Power Co	227,000
Northern Idaho & Montana Power Co. (Kalispell)	2,000
Missoula Light & Power Co	1,500
Total horsepower	230,500

I am informed that the great Montana Co. has a paid-up capital of $85,000,000, and not only owns practically all the water-power development of Montana, but controls a very large amount of water power yet undeveloped.

Notwithstanding the great capital of this company and the great development it has made, and the large amount of undeveloped property it owns, the inhabitants of Montana are supplied with cheaper electricity than those of any other country, which contributes greatly to their prosperity and happiness.

I think it is also a fact that these great companies do not pay any charges to the Federal Government for the use of the water power they have developed, and that is the reason why they are enabled to furnish to their customers cheaper power, heat, and light than any other people in the world are enjoying.

Mr. President, this provision of the bill was inserted after studying the reports and utterances of the gentlemen from whose testimony I have read and of others. It was the intention to secure to the country the best development of the water resources of the district where the improvement was to be made, and for no other purpose.

If the word "region" is objectionable to anyone I will agree to strike it out. I will readily agree to place before it the word "immediate," so as to read "immediate region," or strike out the word "region" and make it "district," or let it read "the immediate district," because the committee had no other object in placing this provision in the bill than such as I have referred to and such as has been referred to in the quotations I have read from eminent men learned upon this subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield, and to whom?

Mr. SHIELDS. I first yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator when I interrupted him before and he declined at that time to yield, in regard to several of the articles that he has read. He has read from several men who are very good authority on this subject and men who do not agree at all with the theory of the Senator's bill. I can not remember now which particular persons they were, but I ask him if what he was reading was not made by the authors as an argument in favor of a charge to be made by the Government on the development of water power?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not so understand it. My understanding is that they were arguing in favor of a large development and union of different water powers. I want to say that the Senator is right in his statement that most of these gentlemen, from whose writings or evidence I have read, are extremists, agreeing with his views upon such matters, and I think they all advocate charges where the development is upon public lands—I can not say that they all do—where the development is upon navigable rivers.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought from what I could hear from some of the articles the Senator was reading there was an argument made with that particular object in view.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator, I think, is entirely mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I could not have a very good idea, because——

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the revenue subject had no bearing on the views expressed by them.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not have access and could not interrupt the Senator at the time, because he had declined the interruption, but it occurred to me, I think it was in Secretary Fisher's arugment, though it might have been some one else the Senator read, that he referred to the fact that because the Government was regulating rates it ought to be permitted to branch out, and it would not be so hard for them to branch out if they were regulated by the Government. It occurred to me that they were making an argument there in favor of a charge, and that when they had that kind of a charge they would then be in favor of quite extensive ownership.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee now yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]?

Mr. SHIELDS. In a moment. The Federal Government, of course, could not regulate the price or the charge for water-power development within the States by a State manufacturing company. I wish to say now that I do not concur in Secretary Fisher's views about monopolies. He was willing to allow any sort of a monopoly. I do not agree to that. There is a provision in this bill prohibiting any development that is made under it from becoming a part of any monopoly or any conspiracy in restraint of trade. While I thought the Sherman antitrust law would have been sufficiently prohibitive, yet in order to make the matter absolutely clear this special provision was inserted. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I am glad to hear that the Senator is willing to make some concession with respect to the word "region" as it occurs here. It seems to me that if this provision of the bill is to be retained at all it ought to be further limited—for instance, if I may make the suggestion, to give to the War Department the power to limit or prescribe it. But that is not the special feature to which I wish to call the Senator's attention.

Mr. SHIELDS. This provision does give him that discretion.

Mr. POMERENE. It is pretty doubtful, I think. It seems to me, as we recognize there is a doubt, it ought to be eliminated, if possible, by giving the language more clearness of expression.

I wish particularly to call attention to another objection which was raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The bill provides that "preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development," and so forth.

Now, what is meant by the words "best qualified"? The Senator from Montana has referred to one particular instance. If $5,000,000 capital was necessary and another man had $100,000,000, financially at least, he would be the better qualified of the two. But let me call attention to another feature. Suppose there is some large company in the vicinity that already has several dams and is giving power and consequent light and heat to a large and substantial community, his prices may be somewhat excessive, but he is fully equipped to continue in this business and to extend it; he may be a bidder by reason of his superior financial condition, by reason of the fact that he has a completed organization and a full complement of men; he may be better qualified to take up this work immediately and to prosecute it than I would be able to do who, it may be, was contemplating going into this business as a new venture for me. I may not have my organization complete; I may not have quite as much money, but I may be able to procure it; and if I get possession of this power site from the Government I may be able to organize my company and be able to complete the improvements and enter into competition with the other company that is already located in that particular vicinity, and by reason of that competition keep down the prices; but under the phraseology of this bill the Government must give this power site to the man who is already established in business, and thereby he will be able to cut out a possible competitor. It seems to me that the language as contained in this provision is unfortunate and that it would tend toward a monopoly of all the water power in that section of the country. I do not believe that that was the purpose of the framers of the bill, but I think it is possible it would have that effect. For that reason, it seems to me, the whole provision should be eliminated.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio asks what the word "qualified" means. That must be taken in connection with all the remainder of the section. I think clearly that the Secretary of War would consider the solvency of any company that applied, and that it would be his duty to do so even without this provision. He should not grant a permit to an insolvent company, to one with insufficient capital that would have to hawk the project around for the purpose of securing the necessary capital, when a company that had ample capital to make the development was willing to undertake it, and do it then.

This bill was not framed in the interest of the investor or of the construction companies, but in that of the consumer, of the people where these great natural resources are situated. The object is to so frame the measure as to make it attractive to men who have money and to get them to invest it in water-power plants so as to develop these resources and give the people the benefit of them. The resources are there; they are locked up; they are absolutely worthless to the inhabitants of the country. Necessarily it is only in their development and in their use that the people can be benefited. It takes large sums of money to make developments of the kind that this bill contemplates. Its provisions are confined to navigable streams. There is no intention in the bill to regulate small streams or to regulate water power directly applied. I might say that the chief object of this bill is to provide for large developments, whereby hydroelectricity may be generated for the various useful purposes in manufacturing fertilizers and explosives, of which we have had so much discussion, which I will not repeat. It is only the large developments that can do that, and it takes immense sums of money to do it. In order to procure that power in most places in the United States you have got to utilize all the power of the region. Unless you have a very large development these objects can not be accomplished.

I want to give the Senator from Ohio an illustration of a case to which this would apply. I do not know whether or not he was in the Senate Chamber yesterday when the colloquy took place between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in regard to Priest Rapids on the Columbia River.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I was not.

Mr. SHIELDS. Those rapids are some miles long. I have forgotten how many. I will ask the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I do not know just what is the length of the rapids, but it requires a dam about 90 feet high to develop the full maximum of power there.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was stated by the Senator from Washington that a dam 90 feet high would develop an enormous power there. The Senator also stated the great benefits to that section of the country whereby many acres of most fertile lands could be irrigated and made to produce great crops. He further said, however, in answer to interrogatories by the Senator from Alabama, that if an improvement were constructed in the middle of the rapids, it would practically destroy the great development that could be made.

The case stated is that if a man comes with $1,000,000 and offers to make a development, and another man comes with five million, which would be preferred? If $1,000,000 would only develop one part of the water power in that region, why, then, a permit ought not to be granted to him by the Secretary of War; he ought to grant it to a company that has the capital to develop the entire resources; one that would conserve the public interests. That is the object of this provision. To grant a permit to a small power would absolutely destroy the use of the water power for hydroelectric purposes, the great use to which it can be put.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator desire to ask me a further question?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not for one minute intend to suggest that the committee was not actuated by a proper purpose in drawing this bill, but it was with a view of aiding in the improvement of the bill that I made the suggestion which I did.

Mr. SHIELDS. And the committee will be glad to have such suggestions.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, it seems to me that the Senator from Tennessee has not yet fully answered the objection which I raised. Let me make it a little clearer, if I can.

Mr. SHIELDS. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. If a fully organized company has in a given locality three different dams, they are engaged in the business of generating power, they are fully equipped to go ahead and construct another dam and thereby add to the plant which they already have, clearly that company is in a better condition, is perhaps better qualified to go ahead and construct Dam No. 4 and to secure a consequent increase in power therefrom than I would be if I thought I saw an opportunity to construct Dam No. 4 and was about to organize a company for that purpose, but did not have my organization complete, was not prepared on the instant to go into the work, but it would take me a little time to perfect my preliminary arrangements; yet it seems to me that under the phraseology of this bill the Government would be compelled to give the right to construct Dam No. 4 to the old established company, and thereby would aid in continuing its privilege of keeping up the prices of power to any point that it might desire, and would keep me out of the field, when, if I were permitted to enter it, I would be there as a competitor of the company to which I have just referred and would be able thereby to aid in controlling the prices and keep them down to a reasonable limit. It seems to me that, under the conditions that I have suggested, the old established company would be the best qualified concern at that particular time when the obligation is made. I do not believe that it was the intention of the framers of this bill to foster what might become a monopoly in that particular locality. It is for that reason, it seems to me, that this entire provision should be eliminated.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not think such a case could arise as the Senator has suggested. Of course, if the new company was not qualified, if it did not have the capital to make the improvement, and the other company wanted to make the improvement, it seems to me it ought to be allowed to do so.

The question is not what is best for the company that desires to make the improvement, but who will best and quickest develop the resources of the region or district for the benefit of the people.

As to the monopoly and high rates, that is amply provided for by regulations, so as to fully protect the consumer. I shall have no objection, but will readily consent to striking out the word "region," and inserting that of "district," or the words "immediate district."

I have no faith in the language used in the bill, and I do not want to continue to consume time and delay action on this bill because of differences about words which mean the same thing, and similar things which seem to me, in some instances, to be wholly immaterial.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word as to what I myself had in mind in connection with this matter. I appreciate the force of what the Senator from Montana has said. I think the committee, as well as myself, had this in mind when we put this provision in the bill: This is a permit for the building of a dam in a navigable stream. We have said in the first part of the bill that we want the development to be such as will not only permit navigation but will also utilize all the other possibilities tributary—that is really what it means—tributary to that dam. For instance, in the case that I cited we want not only a dam that will take care of the navigation at Priest Rapids but that will also furnish power for the irrigation of hundreds of thousands of acres of land lying right around that place.

What I had in mind in reference to this provision was something like this: Suppose that two applicants come to the Secretary of War, each of them having ample plans, showing a contemplated development that will cover all the needs of the district, or the region, or whatever you may call it. The term "region" there, I think, as the Senator from Tennessee suggested, would be modified by the context, by the purpose simply to cover that which is tributary to the project or the dam. Suppose these two applicants come, and each one of them has his plans all right so far as the contemplated development is concerned, and one of them shows that he has the money, or controls the money, so that there is no doubt about his being able to carry out the construction of the dam if he is authorized to do so, but it appears that the other man has not the money, or has not sufficient money in his own right, and does not make a sufficient showing that he has connections that will furnish the money, although he is a man of standing, possibly, and assures the Secretary of War that he can go out and get the money. My idea was that the man who shows that he is able to complete the project should have the permit in preference to the man who does not show that he is able to complete it. I did not contemplate the situation suggested by the Senator from Montana, where, although one man had enough money and showed that he was able to put the improvement in, another man with stronger capital might come in and be granted the permit; and if any language can be suggested to cover the situation better, I will be glad indeed to have it, because I would not myself want to compel the Secretary of War to give the permit to the man who simply showed he had the most money. I would not want to do that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that the preceding language contemplates that both of them are equally well qualified? Each of them may have command of resources necessary for the development contemplated, and one of them may have so much that he can control the water resources of the region.

Mr. JONES. Well——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I refer to this language:

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. JONES. I want to call the Senator's attention to this situation: Two men may make application and each of them may show that he is well qualified and has sufficient money to construct the dam and locks necessary to take care of navigation and interstate commerce, but we may want other things done, and one of the applicants does not show that he is as well qualified as the other to build a dam 90 feet high instead of 45 feet high. So that the language in line 12 is broader than the qualification mentioned in lines 8 and 9. There might be two men equally qualified to put in whatever improvement was necessary for navigation, but with reference to putting in a plant sufficient to provide power for the irrigation of arid lands, and so forth, one might not be so well qualified as the other. I can see a little difference; but I did not have that in mind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment. I did have in mind just what I said a while ago, that two men might present applications, one of whom would have the ready control of sufficient money, while the other could not show that he had sufficient capital; and I wanted to grant the permit to the man who showed that he could carry out the project. If better language can be used here, I will be glad to have it put in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not possible that the words "of the region" might be construed to apply to a very large expanse of territory?

Mr. JONES. They might. I am perfectly willing to have that amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be well to have the words "of the region" stricken out, so that the language would really refer to the particular enterprise, the particular development, leaving opportunity for a division of grants to different companies?

Mr. WALSH. That suggestion conforms to my idea. It is already provided for by the preceding language.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the words "of the region" were stricken out——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that there could not be any division of grants or permits. There is only one grant for putting in one dam; that is all. This provision relates to the application for a permit to put a dam in a stream, and there could not be any division of grants with reference to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but there may be two applications for the same grant, and one of the companies may present evidence of the fact that it is able to take care of the water powers of the region. I would like to have the words "of the region" stricken out, and, if I may be allowed, I will move to strike them out.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Montana has moved to strike out all of those lines there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think if the words "of the region" were stricken out it would free it from criticism.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there is not any need of doing that, because his idea is well taken care of by other language that precedes that.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator from Montana a question.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me a moment?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia if that will obviate the objection to this provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to suggest that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia would enlarge the error rather than limit it, if there is error in it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I do not want the amendment made.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would make the rule applicable, then, not to a region alone but to the entire United States. The words "of the region," as found in the bill, are really words of limitation.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think they ought to be there at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. I really think so, too, since the Senator has suggested it; and I think it would be better to make it read "of that immediate district." That would limit it to a particular locality.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How would it do to say "the development of the water resources under consideration," or something of that kind, so that it would certainly not extend to any other except the particular grant.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator means that, all he has to do is to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Montana. There can not be any question about that, I think.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that what is intended is that preference shall be given to the company that is best fitted to develop the maximum capacity of the particular project.

Mr. JONES. That is it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not the language of the bill.

Mr. JONES. That is the purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it ought to be made plain.

Mr. JONES. The committee will welcome any suggestions that will better carry out the purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How would it do to strike out, after the word "of," the words "all the water resources of the region," and make it read "the project under consideration," or language of that kind?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would be better to have it read:

Preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of the particular dam.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. "Of the particular dam under consideration," or "of the dam or dams under immediate consideration," or "of the project under consideration."

Mr. CUMMINS. As stated by the Senator from Washington, there can not be but one dam under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Could it not be possible that a particular development would require more than one dam? How would it be to say "of the project under consideration" or "of the development under consideration"?

Mr. CUMMINS. This section of the bill relates to an application to construct a dam in a navigable river at a particular place, and the regulation here is to govern the Secretary of War in granting or refusing to grant the permit which is requested. I am sure that the preference ought not to extend beyond the ability of the applicant to do the best for the particular project.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, if we would strike out the word "all," before the words "water resources," and let it read "development of the water resources under consideration or water resources involved," in place of the words "of the region," leaving out the word "all" and the words "of the region," something of that kind would limit it to the particular enterprise.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Tennessee has suggested this language:

Preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to promote the public welfare.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am willing to have that amendment made.

Mr. JONES. I understood that is what the Senator suggested; and I want to call that to the attention of Senators, as probably some of them did not get it. It seems to me that would take care of the situation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I could not possibly object to that; but it does not mean anything, because the Secretary of War, in deciding between two applicants, both equally well qualified, will be required under his oath to give it to that applicant which, in his judgment, is best adapted to promote the public welfare.

Mr. SHIELDS. I agree to that, if that will remove the Senator's objection.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the acceptance of an amendment of that character will be in effect the adoption of my amendment; and, of course, I gladly accept that in view of the other language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. The amendment has been suggested in several different forms. Will the Senator restate it?

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, in lieu of that of the Senator from Montana, is to strike out the words "of the region," in line 12, page 7, and insert "for the public welfare."

Mr. WALSH. I should certainly object to that. That is not the proposition which was made to me at all. It was proposed to me that, instead of the present language, it should read:

That applicant which is best qualified to promote the public interests.

I agree to that.

Mr. SHIELDS. To what lines does the Senator refer? That is an entirely different matter from that we have been discussing.

Mr. WALSH. I refer to line 10. So that the language shall read:

To that applicant which is best qualified—

So far that is the language of the present bill. Now insert:

To promote the public interests.

Mr. SHIELDS. "To promote the public interests and" are the words the Senator wants to insert.

Mr. WALSH. Striking out the remainder down to the semicolon, in line 12.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Montana. Does the Senator from Montana accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee, that the qualification shall be that the Secretary of War may award the permission to the applicant best qualified to promote the public interest?

Mr. WALSH. I do. I desire to say to the Senator from Iowa that the Secretary of War is confronted with this condition: He has two applicants, each equally well qualified to do the work. He would be obliged to make a choice between the two, each equally well qualified. How would he determine that choice?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest——

Mr. WALSH. If I may be pardoned, he would be obliged to determine that choice in accordance with his judgment as to which of these applicants would best subserve the public interests. So that the language, in my judgment, means nothing. It means that my amendment is adopted, and other language is put in imposing a duty upon the Secretary of War, which duty would be imposed upon him if there were no language to that effect in the bill at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator; but suppose one applicant is ahead of the other in time. They are both equally qualified now. Ought not the man who makes the first application be given preference over some one else who follows him?

Mr. WALSH. I rather think that is taken care of by the next provision in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it was intended so; but if the Senator accepts the language suggested by the Senator from Tennessee in place of that which he has attempted to strike out by his amendment, he will find that it will not read so as to make sense.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has not in mind the provision to which I am referring. I am referring to the provision which follows.

Mr. NORRIS. So am I.

Mr. WALSH. There is a further preference. As between those who are thus best qualified, preference must be given "to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is the language to which I have reference.

Mr. WALSH. I should think the Senator's suggestion would be proper in connection with that, rather than with this.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection, of course, to the language suggested by the Senator from Tennessee taking the place of the language that is sought to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Montana; but we shall have to put in some other language, or it will not make sense. I say that because, if you strike out the language included in the Senator's amendment and put in the language of the Senator from Tennessee, it will read like this:

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to promote the public interests, that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

Mr. WALSH. Pardon me, but that is not the idea. The portion to be stricken out, if this language is adopted, ends with the semicolon and then continues:

And as between such contesting applicants—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. That would be all right. Then the Senator from Montana must not withdraw his motion, because it would be necessary to strike out only part of the language included in his motion and leave the other part in.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. If you strike out down to the semicolon, it will work in all right.

Mr. WALSH. If the language of the Senator be substituted for everything that appears down to the word "region," I will then withdraw my proposed amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that will make it all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not agree to the conclusion reached by the Senator from Montana. I take it that he must have in his mind improvements that may be used to irrigate arid lands, or that contemplate the use of the water in some way under the law of a State. That, however, will prevail over a very limited region. Generally the navigable streams of the United States are not in arid lands, and, generally speaking, the right to construct a dam in what I call the theoretically or abstractly navigable streams does not require the observance of the law of any State. It requires simply the consent of the riparian proprietor.

Take my own State, for instance. In either of the three streams which may be classed as navigable streams, though there is no navigation upon them, but which would undoubtedly be covered by the provisions of the act as they now exist, one who desires to erect a dam is not compelled to observe any law adopted by the State. His only obstacle is the legislation of the Federal Government, and the moment he acquires the consent of the Federal Government he may erect the dam.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Now, suppose 10 applications to erect a dam in one of those streams at a given place were filed before the Secretary of War in the period of a year, but none of them had been acted upon by the Secretary of War. If the amendment that is now apparently agreed upon between the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Montana shall prevail——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there is no agreement between the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Tennessee. I entirely misunderstood the proposition. I did not know that anything was to be stricken out except the last three words. There is no understanding between us.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then I was mistaken. At any rate, the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana as having been agreed upon between him and the Senator from Tennessee would authorize the Secretary of War to balance up the claims of these several applicants, and although one might have been filed a year before the other and although they might be equally qualified to develop the particular project and to utilize all the power that could be generated at that place in the river, still the Secretary of War could bring into the adjustment the question of the public interest and say, "I will give this permission to Mr. A, because it seems to me that he will be able to use the right for the public interest in a larger or better way than could Mr. B." That simply means that the Secretary of War is given the authority to exercise his personal preference as between those applicants.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator says, but it occurs to me that his remarks are more appropriately addressed to the language which next follows. The language next following deals with the subject of preferences in point of time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but the clause that follows does not control or govern the case that I have put at all. The clause that follows refers only to those instances in which the applicant must in some way secure the permission of the State in which the improvement is to be located, either for the use of the water or for the use of the bed of the stream or something of that kind. Now, in my State it is not so.

Mr. WALSH. That was just what I intended to suggest to the Senator—that it seems to me he might very properly propose an amendment addressed to that portion of the bill which would give a preference to the party first in point of time in his application to the Secretary of War whenever no preliminary steps are required by the laws of the States. The preference in the matter of time, it seems to me, comes next for consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I am on my feet, I may as well state my position with regard to this particular matter. In my judgment the law should provide that the permit should be granted in the order of application. I mean, now, as between individuals or private corporations. It might be that an exception should be made in favor of a municipality or a public-utility corporation. The permit should be granted in the order of application, provided the applicant shows that he is qualified to develop the resources of power in that particular project. There ought to be no discretion on the part of the Secretary of War which can be exercised without the possibility of ever calling him to account. The very moment he is vested with a discretion which he may rest upon the public welfare or the public interest, there is no possibility of ever criticizing or condemning his judgment in the matter; for no one can successfully question the views of another man which take into account the public welfare or the public interest. You can no more do it than you could question the judgment of a Senator as he casts his vote upon some measure that affects the public welfare or the public interest.

I am sure the Senator from Tennessee must see the justice of the suggestion I have made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have heard the discussion with relation to this matter, and the more I hear of it the more I think the language which is used by the committee in framing this bill is the best.

What is the object and purpose of this provision? It is that where there is an area of land or an area of country that is capable of producing a large quantity of power development, the person ought to be favored who is capable of utilizing the most of that water. These enterprises, when they are once constructed, are the only ones that will be constructed. Consequently, as the object is to get into one enterprise a utilization of all the water, you can readily see that if you do it in piecemeal you will never be able to get the development.

I want to illustrate what I mean with relation to that. You may have a water-power development in the nature of a dam. The flow of the water at that point in winter runs down to a very small amount, so that it is capable of generating, perhaps, not more than 1,000 horsepower, but in the summer time it is capable of generating 100,000 horsepower. To permit a dam to be constructed across that river without any auxiliary works is really to destroy the great flow of water that comes every year in the river.

If a person presents a proposition and says, "I have here a scheme by which, by the construction of reservoirs, I will hold back this great surplus of water that comes in the summer time and which goes to waste, and which will forever go to waste unless reservoirs are constructed, and I will make it so that during the wintertime, when the flow is slight, it can be augmented so that a hundred thousand horsepower can be generated there," is it not to the interest of the Government that the application shall be granted which will give that uniform flow of water all the time?

Consequently, it seems to me, when we consider this language, that that was the very purpose and the very object of it, namely, to utilize the water. That is the primary purpose and the primary interest of the Government.

How can we utilize every drop of water that falls? That is the question. Can we do it by authorizing the erection of a dam that does not take into consideration the construction of reservoirs? If we do that, nobody else will ever construct a reservoir for that purpose. This company might do it or might not do it. But if the company is able and willing to do it right then, and such a proposition is made to the Secretary of War, it seems to me he ought to accept it right then, and the bigger the enterprise the more benefit the general public receives.

It is infinitely better for the Government that we should have 100,000 horsepower generated at one of these plants than that we should have 1,000 horsepower generated. Consequently, any scheme presented by any person making application that will develop that 100,000 horsepower and thereby utilize all the waters that flow in the stream or in the region, it seems to me, would be the proper thing and to the best interests of the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the situation in the Tennessee River at the Muscle Shoals. They are several miles long; the river is over a mile and a half wide, and there are several channels. The topography of the country is such that half a million dollars could be spent right in the middle of those rapids and thus practically destroy the possibility of all other improvement. One dam right in the middle of the rapids might possibly develop 50,000 horsepower; but if the project is developed fully with two dams, which can be constructed according to surveys that the Government has made showing the whole thing, fully 600,000 horsepower will be developed, which will make the plant the third largest in the United States. As I have said, a small dam right in the middle of the rapids will destroy that great development, and then there could be none there that would be sufficient to generate hydroelectricity.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The illustration of the Senator from Tennessee is directly in point.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado pardon me a moment while I call attention to a feature of the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. In connection with the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee just now, let me say that that condition is taken care of in another provision of the bill. At page 4 you will find the following:

> The project adopted, including the plans, specifications, and location for any dam and accessory work, shall be such as in the judgment of the Secretary of War shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes.

So that a man can not come along and get a permit from the Secretary to erect such a dam as that which would destroy the usefulness of the rest of the locality; but the Secretary of War can make a comprehensive plan for the development of all the water-power resources of that region, and then a man makes his application.

Mr. SHIELDS. That question applies to an entirely different matter. This applies where there are two applicants equally well qualified, and the object of it is to reinforce the provision to which the Senator has referred. Both are necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose, instead of using the language "which is best qualified," in speaking of the applicant, language should be used which would make it read in this way:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant whose plans will best expedite and realize the maximum useful development of the water resources of the region.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There ought to be ability also back of the plans, because a man with very little responsibility could come in with plans.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but they are equally well qualified, according to the provision above, and the distinction between the two is to be the granting of a permit to that one of the two "whose plans will best expedite and realize the maximum useful development of the water resources of the region." Substitute "whose plans will best" for "which is best qualified."

If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he does not think that language improves it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should not think so. The trouble about it is that the preference is given to the one whose plans will best promote the development of the water resources of the whole region. Of course, I agree with the Senator that the preference should be given to the one whose plans are best adapted to the development of that particular project.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, suppose we put before the word "region" the word "immediate." What I had in view was to limit the expense, and yet to take the one whose plans would really best develop that immediate locality.

Mr. WALSH. I shall probably have something to say later about the use of the word "immediate."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think the suggestion last made by the Senator from Georgia would do, because you would not get the maximum amount of water utilized. This thing of saying that it shall be in the immediate region, or in immediate proximity to the plant, will not do at all. The purpose of this provision is to utilize every drop of water that falls on a particular watershed. That is the object of it. Inasmuch as the water falls at irregular times, and inasmuch as it falls in the springtime and in the summer time more than it does in the wintertime, it makes an irregular flow. The object is to utilize those flows so as to equalize them, and thereby get a constant flow.

You have got to have a constant flow. You can not erect a water-power plant that generates electricity and let it utilize the 100,000 horsepower that is generated during the big flow and then let it go down to 1,000 horsepower. You would not get a plant that would ever pay if you should do that, because there is a period from October to March when you would not be able to run your plant, and that is the very time when you would need it most for lighting. Consequently, the object of this provision is to provide in one plan for the utilization of all of the waters of a particular locality so that there can be storage to supply the deficiency in the water of the stream when the season is such that the river is low.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado, as it seems to me, has made a perfectly valid argument, and I do not dissent from it; but the difficulty is that his argument is not based on the bill. The provision which he is discussing does not do the thing which he believes ought to be done.

Now let me state a case. Four applicants, we will say, appear before the Secretary of War in the course of a few months for permission to build a dam in a river at a particular point. The Secretary of War looks over the whole situation and he prescribes the plan of the dam, with storage reservoirs if necessary, if he thinks such reservoirs are required in order to conserve the water of the region. The plans are there which govern the erection of that dam, or the structures incidental to the dam, and if any dam is built at that point by anybody it must conform to the plans and specifications that have been prescribed by the Secretary of War. That, Mr. President, is provided for in another part of this bill.

Then the Secretary of War comes to the duty of determining which one of these applicants shall be permitted to build that dam. Assuming that they build according to plans and specifications, it matters not which one builds, because in any event the dam must be of that character. The Secretary of War must decide between these four applicants. How should he decide? It is perfectly evident that he ought to cast aside the application of anyone who is not qualified or competent to carry out the plan. But assuming that they are all qualified to carry out the plan, what standard or what rule does this bill provide for selection between these applicants?

That is the difficulty with the bill. It is not because the argument of the Senator from Colorado is not sound. I think it is sound; for we want to utilize to its maximum the water power at a given point, and the manner in which it shall be utilized is entirely within the power of the Secretary of War. But I do not believe in giving the Secretary of War the right to choose between applicants, all of whom are qualified to produce the very last ounce of power that can be produced at that point by merely saying, "Here is one who is more competent than another to develop the general water resources of the region."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me read the second paragraph of section 2 to which the Senator has referred. While I have read it a number of times, I do not exactly bear it in mind:

Second. The project adopted, including the plans, specifications, and location for any dam and accessory work, shall be such, as in the judgment of the Secretary of War, shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes, and best adapted to conserve and utilize the water resources of the region in the interests of navigation, the needs of the Government, and the public welfare.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I just want to suggest to the Senator that that prescribes the plan that the Secretary of War must provide for in any permit that he grants. It seems to me that that covers all of the modifications that we have tried to make here.

I want to make a suggestion, and see how it strikes the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Iowa and also the Senator from Montana. I suggest modifying the language, beginning in line 6, page 7, so that it shall read in this way:

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder—

Then cut out the rest from line 7 down to the middle of line 14 and begin with the word "preference"— preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

It seems to me with that the Secretary of War would put in the permit what the Senator has just read in paragraph 2, and then the applicant who applied for the permit would do what the Secretary of War prescribed. Then the one who first complied with the laws of the State, it seems to me, should be granted a permit. That would take care of the whole situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose there is no law of the State to be complied with, as I just a moment ago remarked?

Mr. JONES. Then, I would say the first applicant.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all I insist on.

Mr. JONES. I would say the first applicant who applies where there is no law of the State, and where there are laws, the first one who complies with the laws of the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am not a member of the committee which framed this bill. If the provision which the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Washington have referred to fully covers the situation as to the plan it seems to me the suggestion would be a good one, but inasmuch as these provisions are separate and they may or may not refer to the same thing, unless it is clear I do not see that it would do any harm to keep in this provision as it is, because it is the maximum amount of water that flows that we want to conserve, and if by one plan or by one applicant you can get a flow of only a certain quantity of water there is no likelihood that anybody else will ever improve that stream for the purpose of utilizing the rest. That being the case, the great mass of water to be conserved, under the plan and under a bid of one person, would be lost, and it would go on forever as a loss to the Government and the people of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose that one applicant appeared before the Secretary of War the 1st of January and another one comes on the 1st of July, both equally qualified to carry out the plan that had been adopted by the Secretary of War, how would the Senator feel if the Secretary of War under this very vague direction would give the permit to the company that came in on the 1st of July and reject the one that came in on the 1st of January?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It would be wrong if they are equal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose, after the first application was in, for some reason some friend of the Secretary should advise a rival company that an application had been filed but had not yet been acted upon, whereupon the favorite company would enter the field and, being as competent as the first one to develop the resources of the stream, should receive the permit. The Senator would agree that that is wrong?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then why give to the Secretary of War the opportunity to display favoritism of that kind? Happily, we have not had Secretaries of War that could be accused of doing a thing of that sort, but we do not know what will happen, and I do not believe in giving a discretion when it is not necessary in order to carry out the purpose of Congress.

Mr. SHAFORTH. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal of strength and force in what the Senator says. If I could be convinced that this would be covered in every instance by the plan as specified in the preceding section, I would have no hesitancy in saying it is correct and should be adopted. Unquestionably, as between persons who are equally qualified, the plans being made and the bids being made, it does seem to me it is covered by the second clause of this very matter that the Senator from Montana asks be stricken out:

And as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in such respect, then preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State—

And so forth.

That other provision was put there for some purpose, unquestionably, and I do not know exactly what contingencies it covers. It might be that the plans did not specify of what material it might be made. It might be that one person would say it is necessary to construct it of granite and another would say, "I want simply a dirt dam." There might be a change of that kind that would be giving a discretion to the Secretary of War.

Evidently if the plans are identical and if the plans are specific so that there can not be any change, the man who makes the filing first is entitled to and should be given the grant. But it seems to me it is there for some purpose, and it is there in the nature of some kind of a suggestion made by one of them that a greater quantity of water can be conserved by letting him produce power either in the form of an addition to the contract or in some other particular, of which I do not know, because I did not frame the language. But it is, as the Senator says, clearly covered by the first section, and unquestionably he is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will bring to the attention of the Senator the case of my own State, and I think it is the case of a good many States. Suppose that two applicants from my State would appear with an application for permission to build a dam. Neither of them has any certificate from the State; neither of them has complied with the law of the State respecting such things, because there are no such laws. What would the Senator do with regard to such an instance as that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The first who makes an application to the Secretary of War would be the one who ought to get it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all I desire.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is covered, it seems to me, by this provision:

> And as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in such respect, then preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State—

And so forth.

If they are not equal according to this, if some one has something additional to suggest even to the plan to the Secretary of War—it might be a suggestion to utilize more water—it ought to be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator forgets in the case I assume neither of the applicants has complied with the law of the State, because there are no laws to comply with.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not mean complying with the laws; I mean the first applicant who presents himself to the Secretary of War will be the one who ought to receive it as between equal applicants, and that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is not in the bill at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it is right here. It says:

> And as between such contesting applicants.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are applicants for a water-development plant—

> Which appear equally well qualified in such respect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then "preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed." Let me put in there, "if there be no such laws, then to the first applicant to the Secretary of War."

Mr. CUMMINS. That would cover the point I suggested, but it is not in the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I guess that is true. We in our State have specific laws relating to water-power plants and the filing necessary to be made in the State engineer's office. It is a very complete system. But that can be remedied by simply inserting "if there be no law of the State where the plant is to be constructed, then it shall be the first applicant to the Secretary of War."

Mr. JONES. In suggesting the change I did a moment ago I made a mistake. A part of it only, I think, should go in. I wish to make this suggestion now to the Senator from Tennessee and all those who are interested in this matter, that beginning in line 6 it should read this way:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified—

Then strike out the rest and put in—

> To comply with the conditions imposed herein.

That would be in paragraph 2. Then go down to line 14, beginning with the word "preference":

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

To meet the objection of the Senator from Iowa I would add:

> Or if there are no State laws to be complied with, preference shall be given to the first applicant.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that amendment will be altogether satisfactory to me, so far as the subject to which we have been referring is concerned. That is my idea exactly. But I want to submit to the Senator from Washington that the language which is used here touching State laws is of a most ambiguous character. Of course, we desire to give the preference to the one that has made the appropriation—that is to say, if a man has already made an appropriation and enjoys the right to the use of the water and is an applicant for the privilege of putting in a dam and another is equally well qualified—we want to give the preference, of course, to the man who has already acquired the water rights.

I do not think the language "who has first complied with the laws of the State" meets the situation. I have no doubt in the world that the committee intended to meet that situation. They intended to preserve to us our system in the West.

Mr. JONES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. WALSH. But you will remember the act contemplates that corporations for public-utility purposes will be created. I submit to the Senator's consideration as well as to the Senator from Iowa that two applicants from the State might come down here, both corporations. One started first. I was asking the attention of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will kindly give his attention to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I was considering the case of two corporations in the State of Iowa organized for the purpose of conducting a certain development. One got out its articles of incorporation and recited in its articles of incorporation the purpose to carry on this development. The other did likewise, but was later in complying with the State laws, with respect to incorporating, and so on. I do not know whether it is the Senator's purpose to give the preference to the one who first started in the State to take out articles of incorporation or whether it is desired to give the preference to the one who first filed the application here.

But that is not the point I am particularly speaking of now. Whichever takes out its articles of incorporation first or complies with other laws of the State, my idea is that preference should be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the waters of the stream. So I suggested to the Senator from Tennessee the other day, to meet our situation the language ought to be "the applicant who has first acquired the right to divert the waters of the stream by means of a dam to erect which the permit is sought and who has otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States." I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington ought to incorporate some such language as that.

Mr. JONES. I think that is right. Of course I was making my suggestion simply to meet the proposition advanced by the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had not supposed that the laws relating to incorporation and the like were the laws that are referred to in this provision. I assume that the laws referred to here are laws which give a certain person or corporation some right in the stream proposed to be dammed.

Mr. WALSH. I understood that that is the position of the Senator, but the language does not seem to be very appropriate to meet that position.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree that it might be made more specific.

Mr. SHIELDS obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to impose on the Senator, but I wish to say a word in response to the Senator from Montana about an agreement between us.

Mr. SHIELDS. It was about that agreement I wanted to make an inquiry. I wished to inform the Senate of that agreement so that there might not be any further discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Tennessee had an agreement, I understood, some time ago about the pending amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. That was a mistake.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, as I remember it, said he had misunderstood what the statement was.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; I misunderstood what it was.

Mr. NORRIS. So the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Montana to strike out the words included in his first motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I misunderstood the Senator from Montana. I did not know he had moved to strike out. The Senator from Montana and I did discuss this amendment. I did not concede that the words are ambiguous. I think they fully cover the case. The words "the laws of the State where the project is located" were placed there because different States have different laws in regard to navigable streams. Then there is the doctrine of prior appropriation existing in several of the Western States which is not in force in the States bordering on the Mississippi River and east of it. I am perfectly willing to be more explicit, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, if he thinks that it would be best for the Western States and for his State, where the doctrine of prior appropriation applies.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word on the amendment. I realize that there are two lines of thought, each one of which is based upon arguments appealing to reasonable and honest people with different degrees of force. The one line is that it is best to have all these power plants generating electricity controlled and owned by one large concern, and that regulated; in other words, to eliminate competition and provide for the consumer by regulation. As I understand those who have drafted this provision, they have drafted it on the theory that that is the proper way to develop the resources and that it will redound in the end more beneficially to the consumer.

So they have provided in the bill the language that the Senator from Montana by his motion seeks to strike out, that that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the resources of the region shall be given preference wherever there is a contest. Of course, that language means—it can not mean anything else, and I presume it was not intended to—that the man or corporation able to reach out all over the country and take charge of the water-power development, who has the money and the backing by which he can improve them all, shall be given preference in a contest over the right to dam a navigable stream.

There might be cases, it seems to me, where the Secretary of War might deem it best to give such an applicant the preference. I would not want to confine him and to say arbitrarily that he should never give the right where there is a contest to the applicant who is going to develop the most power. At the same time I should dislike to put into the law a cold provision which forces him to do that very thing. He would have no discretion; it would be his duty in all cases to turn down the little fellow and give the right to the big one. The man or the combination of men who could get together the most money would always win.

There would be a good deal of dispute, a great deal of contention, arising over the meaning of the word "region." It is an indefinite word. The Senator from Tennessee in charge of the bill realizes that it is an indefinite word, and he suggests that he would be willing to modify it by some other word which would confine it within some limit. He suggests the word "district." He has given us Webster's definition of "region." I have Webster's Dictionary here on my desk, and I find "district" means about the same as "region." In fact, Webster gives one as synonymous with the other. It is a very indefinite term. It might be applied to the Senate Chamber or to even a portion of this room. It might in another case apply to such a large extent of territory that it would include all the United States; it might include all of a State or it might include two States; but it would certainly in all cases go beyond the dam for the right to construct which application is made. It would always be beyond that.

These applications must come, as I understand it, one at a time. The man applying to the Secretary of War to construct a dam at a certain point in a river would have a preference given him by the Secretary of War if he could show that he had enough money to construct dams at a dozen other places on that river and 25 other places on other rivers that might be in the same vicinity.

As I said, there might be times when upon an examination of the applicants and what they propose to do and what they could do the Secretary of War ought to give it to the man who has the most developed power, but that ought not to be a binding rule. If it were, then you would often cut out municipalities. Here is a stream running through a city, and in the vicinity of that city there is a good power site for a dam. It is a navigable stream, and there can be a wonderful lot of power developed there. That municipality, let us say, for the purpose of supplying the people of that city with light for domestic purposes and supplying the city with light and power for municipal purposes wants to build that dam. But here comes along another, a different corporation, and another fellow says to the Secretary of War, "Our corporation here will build that dam; we already own another dam on the other side of the town; we already own another site over here on some other stream; we are already operating this plant and that plant, and the business we are going to do is ten times greater than that this city wants to do. In fact, we want to develop this power and sell light and heat to this very municipality." That might be one of the objects, and of course the object is to make a profit out of doing it.

It seems to me the Secretary ought to have the right in a case like that to say, "It makes no difference how much you will develop, it does not make any difference how much power and how much money you will have, I will give to the municipality in this case the right to dam the stream and develop power for its purposes."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator the first section of the bill provides that that shall be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there are other arguments in regard to the combination of power, and so forth. Monopoly is prohibited in another place in the bill, but the provisions are contradictory to this one. Here is a specific command in definite language to the Secretary that he shall give the preference right to that applicant who is able to do the most. Suppose it is stricken out as the Senator from Montana has moved, and what is left? Here is the way it would read after the language is stricken out, and I can not see why it is not vastly improved:

As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which has first complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed.

And so forth.

It seems to me that if we compel the Secretary to take the course that the bill outlines we are liable to do often an injury, whereas if we will give him, as I believe we ought, some discretion in the matter, he could grant the permit to the individual or the corporation that under all circumstances ought to have it for the best interests of all the people in the community.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire what is the status of the amendment at this time? I understood that the Senator from Washington was going to propose something in lieu of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I did not offer the amendment awhile ago; I merely suggested it. I thought the Senator from Tennessee, having charge of the bill, would probably present it if it would be satisfactory to him.

Mr. WALSH. Of course I do not want to speak on the matter if the amendment proposed is going to be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee pending or not?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I have not offered any amendment. I have just had an understanding with the Senator from Montana that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington is satisfactory to him, and if that is agreed to he will withdraw the pending amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. Am I correct?

Mr. WALSH. That is satisfactory to me entirely.

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment of the Senator from Washington is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WALSH. I do not. This is offered as a substitute for mine, and I signified my acceptance of it if it is adopted.

Mr. JONES. I will offer this amendment in the place of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana.

After the word "qualified," in line 8, insert the words:

To comply with the conditions imposed herein.

Strike out beginning with the words "to improve," in line 8, down to and including the word "then," in line 14, and after the word "first," in line 15, insert:

Acquire the right to divert the water of the stream by means of a dam, to erect which the permit is sought and otherwise.

Then after the word "constructed," in line 17, insert:

Or if there are no State laws to be complied with preference shall be given to the first applicant.

Mr. WALSH. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not understand that. Is the Senator from Iowa in earnest in his suggestion? Does he insist on it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not possible for the Secretary to get the amendment in this way.

Mr. JONES. I think the Secretary can get it if I send him the memorandum I have here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "qualified," it is proposed to strike out from the words "to improve" down to and including the word "then," in line 14, and to insert "to comply with the conditions imposed herein."

Mr. JONES. That is not all of the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is only a part of it.

Mr. JONES. The Secretary may now read the amendment from the memorandum which I have sent to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "qualified," it is proposed to insert "to comply with the conditions imposed herein"; then to strike out, beginning with the words "to improve," down to and including the word "then," on line 14.

Mr. JONES. That is not all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That must be one amendment, because the other amendment comes in at another place.

Mr. JONES. The words come in in another place, but it is all one amendment; it all comes together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with stating the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "first," in line 15, page 7, it is proposed to insert the words "acquire the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise"; then, after the word "consructed," in line 17, it is proposed to insert the words "or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that all one amendment?

Mr. JONES. That is all one amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] asked me if I was in earnest about the suggestion I made. I will say that I am.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I agree to it, because it does not change the sense.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to say, however, to the Senator from Tennessee, that I am not satisfied with the language proposed by the Senator from Washington; but I assume it has been hastily prepared. What I desire is that, if there are two applicants or three or four applicants from a State like mine, all equally qualified to fulfill the public purpose, that the first applicant shall receive the permit. That is my whole purpose, so far as this amendment is concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment which has just been stated by the Secretary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have it again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I invite attention to section 5 of the bill, which reads:

SEC. 5. That unless revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act the rights under any such permit shall continue for a period of 50 years from and after the date of the completing and putting into commercial operation of the initial installation required by the Secretary of War, as provided in section 9 of this act, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until revoked for cause as provided in section 8 of this act or until terminated and compensation has been made to such grantee for its property as provided in section 6 of this act.

I will say for the information of the Senate, in exposition of this particular section, that subsequent sections provide for forfeiture for failure to comply with these conditions, and they likewise provide for the recapture by the Government, at the expiration of the period of 50 years, of the property which has been accumulated, constituting the entire plant. Mr. President, I want a definite termination to this period. I want the water-power company to have the permit for 50 years, and to have it then come to an end. Of course I do not feel that the company ought to be dispossessed of its property until the value of such property has been determined and the amount to which the company is entitled has been paid to it; but this section contemplates that the 50-year period shall commence to run at the time of the completion of the first installation. That may be some indefinite time in the future.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. The objection of the Senator only relates to maybe a year or two; it depends on the size of the dam to be constructed. It might shorten the permit a year or two. That language was put in the bill in order to give the company making the improvement 50 years in which to operate, but it is not a very material matter. It is like some others, I think, with all respect, that the Senator has offered to the bill, or proposes to offer, in copies of amendments presented to me—27 in number—which largely change the language and rewrite the bill. I am glad to have any suggestion that contributes to bettering the bill, and especially in the interest of the consumer; but I hardly thought the Senator ought to want to rewrite the bill after it has been considered by two committees, after it has had so much attention devoted to it, and been so carefully prepared; but, in order to save some time and to obviate all of these small amendments, I am going to accept this amendment. I do not want to have a day's discussion upon it, and am therefore going to accept it.

Mr. WALSH. That obviates the necessity of any further comment from me. Then, Mr. President, I move to strike out, commencing with the word "and," in line 11, on page 9, down to and including the word "act," in line 14, and to insert, after the word "from," in line 11, the words "the date of the permit," so that the section, if so amended, will read:

That unless revoked for cause, as provided in section 8 of this act, the rights under such permit shall continue for a period of 50 years from the date of the permit, and after the expiration of said 50 years such rights shall continue until revoked—

And so forth.

The purpose of this amendment, Mr. President, is to make the 50 years run from the date of the permit, instead of from the date of the completion of the installation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to a matter—it may be that it can be explained—on page 6. The effort is there made to limit the charges which the Government shall impose where land is taken to the value of the land. It is provided on page 6, line 22:

Such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War—

Then the bill goes on to say—

and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation—

That is very plain. Then the provision continues—

as well as to the business of said grantee.

The bill starts with the proposition that the charge shall be limited to the value of the public land taken. If the words "as well as to the business of said grantee" mean anything, they mean that the benefits to accrue to the grantee from the right that is conferred upon it shall enter into the matter of ascertaining the charge which is to be imposed upon it. Is that the correct interpretation of the language?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; it was intended that whatever benefits be conferred upon the grantee, he ought to pay for.

Mr. CLAPP. Then that clearly introduces a rule of charge outside of and independent of the value of the land taken. If that is the intention, with the first declaration which seems to limit it to the value of the land taken, the right to make this additional charge regardless of the limitation of the land, it seems to me the authority ought to be more clearly stated. It may be that it is sufficiently plain; but I am calling the attention of the Senator to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the very subject-matter of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] this morning, which was rejected. The words which follow—"reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War"—were intended to control him in fixing that value.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true; but that is not the point I am making. The bill proceeds to make the value of the land the basis of the charge, allowing the Secretary to take into account as an offset to that the benefits that will accrue to navigation. Thus far it is very plain. If the subsequent words "as well as to the business of said grantee" mean at that point that the Secretary of War, going beyond the question of the value of the land, may charge to the applicant something accruing on account of the benefit it will be to the grantee to obtain the permit, that authority ought to be, it seems to me, more clearly stated.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is not the object.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, what is the object?

Mr. SHIELDS. The object there is to charge the grantee with any peculiar value the land may have on account of its situation and location.

Mr. CLAPP. Still I do not make myself plain. That is one phase of the case. The provision reads:

Based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation—

That is perfectly plain. If it stopped there, then there could be no question; but then follows the language:

As well as to the business of said grantee.

That can only relate to the beneficial effect on the business of the grantee, and that can only be taken into account as an offset against the benefit to navigation, or it does not mean anything, and yet the authority is not plainly stated, as it ought to be.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator think these words ought to be stricken out?

Mr. CLAPP. No; I think they ought to remain there; but I think they ought to be made plain, so that no two men, such as the Senator from Tennessee and myself, could differ as to what they mean. They mean something.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest that the Senator prepare an amendment and let me look over it at some time, and doubtless we can agree, so far as he and I are concerned. I think I know what those words mean, but if the Senator wants to make the intention clearer, I am perfectly willing that he shall do so.

Mr. CLAPP. I want to know from the Senator if they do not mean that in the equation of charge between the value of the land and the benefit to navigation there shall be taken into account the benefit to the grantee?

Mr. SHIELDS. Only so far as the value of the land is concerned. Those words relate entirely to the action of the Secretary of War in valuing the land.

Mr. CLAPP. We will suppose that the value of the land is found to be $10,000 and the benefit to navigation $15,000. In that case, would the benefit to the business of the grantee be taken into account?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; I can not conceive a case of that kind. The value of the land is comparatively small in a business which will represent in most cases millions of dollars.

Mr. CLAPP. Suppose the value of the land was ascertained to be $10,000 and the benefit to navigation was ascertained to be $5,000—$5,000 less than the value of the land—then, do the words "as well as the business of the said grantee" mean anything?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think they impose a certain charge upon the grantee in valuing the land.

Mr. CLAPP. But only up to the value of the land?

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, yes; only up to the value of the land. It was not intended in any way to allow the Secretary of War to charge for water rights.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, would this be satisfactory as an amendment to the Senator?

Mr. CLAPP. It is not a question of being satisfactory to me; it is a question of making it plain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have taken the language which the Senator from Tennessee has used and then add certain words, so as to make it read:

As well as to the business of said grantee only so far as the value of the land is concerned.

Mr. CLAPP. That would make it plain; but that would be a limitation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that would make it plainer. I move that amendment, Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee does not object.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see what is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendment simply adds, after the words "as well as to the business of said grantee," the words "only so far as the value of the land is concerned."

Mr. SHIELDS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, I move, Mr. President, after the word "grantee," in line 26, on page 6, to insert "only so far as the value of the land is concerned." That conforms to the interpretation which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] put on the provision, as I understand, this morning, and makes it clearer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 26, after the word "grantee," it is proposed to insert "only so far as the value of the land is concerned."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado to what particular part of the language now in the bill the clause which he seeks to add applies?

Mr. SHAFROTH. After the word "grantee," in line 26, on page 6.

Mr. NORRIS. I know where it comes in; but if one were going to analyze it as would a student in school, to what part of the preceding sentence would it be attached? What does it modify?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It modifies the last clause, "as well as to the business of said grantee," and adds to that the words "only so far as the value of the land is concerned."

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I wish the Senator would tell us what it means.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It means just what the Senator from Nebraska interpreted the provision to mean this morning in his speech. He said that this language meant that the Secretary of War could deduct from the land whatever benefit might be conferred, but that he could not go beyond that. That was the line of the Senator's argument this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am merely seeking to express that in the language which the Senator from Tennessee has used, and which I thought was very succinct and clear.

Mr. NORRIS. If there was not any doubt as to what the provision meant when I was discussing it this morning, how does it happen to occur to the Senator now?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] said he did not understand it, and wanted it made clear.

Mr. CLAPP. It happened in this way: After you have established, first, the rule of value of the land, then you deduct the benefit to navigation, and then you can charge against that the benefit to the grantee. I do not believe that it is a limitation on the value of the land, but the authority to make the additional charge is not plain.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator claim that I ever advocated that you could add to the ascertained value the benefit to the grantee?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not claim anything about what the Senator from Nebraska has urged.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it the object of this amendment to make it possible to do that?

Mr. CLAPP. The object of the amendment is to make clear what was meant by the language. It must be remembered that the provision under discussion follows the first limitation. If it means that after you have found the value of the land and then have found the value to navigation you can then, on the other side of the column, find the benefit accruing to the grantee, it should be so stated; there should be no question of the authority.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody has claimed that was true, has he?

Mr. CLAPP. I doubt if there is any court that would limit the benefit to the grantee, under the language as it now reads, to the mere value of the land, and yet it is not plain.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me put a concrete example to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. If there is no force in the suggestion, there is no necessity for any amendment; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been trying to get light on it. Suppose we have a case where the value of the land as land, according to the bill, has been fixed at $100, and the benefit to navigation has been fixed at $200. Would the applicant have to pay anything to the Government?

Mr. CLAPP. Not unless the Secretary of War finds that the charge which should be made for the value of the business exceeds $100. Just start in with the proposition of fixing the charge. Congress could impose a charge based upon the value of the right that the corporation acquires. Now, we first ignore that basis of charge and go to the value of the land. Then we allow as an offset to the value of the land the value to navigation. Then we immediately institute another basis by providing that the Secretary of War shall take into account the benefit to the business of the grantee. My contention is that, instead of being plain as it should be, it is confusing, and I think the discussion has shown that it is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think this amendment clears it up?

Mr. CLAPP. That would clear it up in one way; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield just for a moment? It not only does clear it up, that is true, but it changes the effect of it.

Mr. CLAPP. Ah, if it changes the effect of it, then my contention that, without it, a charge could be made for the benefit without any regard to the value of the land is correct, is it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I myself think it ought to be that way.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I want to give an illustration to the Senator from Minnesota. Suppose that we have an actual case arising under the bill where the value of the land is $100. That would be more than it would usually be found to be. The increased value to navigation is $10,000, and the benefit to the business of the grantee is a million dollars. How much would the grantee have to pay in that case?

Mr. CLAPP. If this bill primarily provided that the Secretary of War should charge on the basis of the value of the business——

Mr. NORRIS. But it does not, does it?

Mr. CLAPP. It does not.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, let us take it just as it is.

Mr. CLAPP. I am answering the Senator's question, and the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] confirms my position, so that it has that much of a basis of doubt at least. If the Secretary of War found that the value of that grant was $1,000,000, while it would be a most extraordinary finding, yet if he was authorized to make the charge when he found that to be the value of it he would charge that for it. We eliminate that, however, and go to the value of the land. Then we allow an offset for the benefit to navigation, and then, without any restriction or limitation or authorization, on the other hand, we say that he shall take into account the benefit accruing to the business of said grantee. That means something or it means nothing.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think this misapprehension arises——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am asking my question in good faith, and I wish the Senator would answer it.

Mr. CLAPP. I have tried to answer it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator thinks I have used too large an amount, let me change it. Suppose that the value of the land is $100, and suppose that the benefits to navigation are $200, and suppose that business of the grantee is valued at $500. How much in dollars and cents, if anything, in that case would the grantee pay to the Government for the land?

Mr. CLAPP. He would under the construction contended for by some pay at least $400. There is no getting away from that, in my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. How does the Senator arrive at that?

Mr. CLAPP. Because the land is worth $100 and the benefit is assessed at $200, which would leave a balance on the Government's side of $100. The benefit to the business is $500, which would leave a balance against the grantee of $400.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has subtracted in that case the value of the improvement to navigation from the value of the applicant's business?

Mr. CLAPP. I subtract, under the contention of some, the improvement to navigation from the two items charged against the grantee, which are, in the first place, the value of the land, and, next, the benefit to his business.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator believes, then, that under this bill it would be the duty of the Secretary of War to charge the grantee in all cases the value of the business that is going to be brought about by reason of the improvement?

Mr. CLAPP. I believe that whenever in framing a law there is doubt about its language, we should make it plain, so that it could not be contended that it meant one of two things.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I think this whole confusion arises from the fact that the only thing to be found here is the amount the grantee shall pay to the United States for the land; that is all. In connection with that fact the Secretary takes into account two other facts, but it does not authorize him to do anything more than to take it into account in assessing the lands. It does not authorize him to make a finding as to whether the value of the land for navigation is so much, or the value to the business of the grantee, but only to the extent that it bears upon the value of the land. Now, let me read it, and you will see how plain the language is:

> And for any land of the United States so used and occupied the grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value as land as may be fixed by the Secretary of War; and in fixing such charges consideration shall be taken of the benefits accruing from the use and occupation of such lands to the interests of navigation, as well as to the business of said grantee.

The only thing that the Secretary of War is authorized to pass upon and to determine is the value of the land, and the language that the Senators are disputing about only goes to that question. The Secretary has no right to find any specific value beyond the value of the land. If the Secretary of War finds, taking into account the value of the land for navigation and the benefits to the business of the grantee combined, that they exceed the value of the land, it means that the grantee shall pay nothing for the land.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but the Senator from Tennessee construes this to mean that if the land is found to be worth a certain amount, say, a thousand dollars, and the benefit to navigation is $500, then the Secretary can charge, as the benefit to business only, $500 more. In other words, the Senator from Tennessee contends that only within the value found of the land the Secretary may offset against the improvement to navigation the benefit to the grantee's business.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; but he has not the right to go to the extreme that the Senator from Nebraska did.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; I did not mean that.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not have the Senator go to the extreme that I would go, but I am quite anxious to find out what the Senator means just the same.

Mr. CLAPP rose.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of fact, I believe——

Mr. CLAPP. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I have the floor, I think. I will yield to the Senator in a minute. As a matter of fact, as I understood the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], he stated the rule correctly, and I stated it several times. It was unreasonable when I stated it, but it has now received the approval of reason. It is that where the value of the land is ascertained the Secretary has no authority to charge anything in excess of the value of the land; but he can offset against that, and it is his duty to do so under the bill as it is drawn, the benefits that may accrue to navigation; and, as the Senator from Minnesota said, if he finds the value of the land as $100 and the benefits that accrue to navigation as $200, he does not pay anything nor get anything nor charge anything. That wipes it off. In other words, the value of the land as land is absolutely the maximum amount that can be charged under this language.

I understood the Senator from Minnesota to advocate that, and that is what I advocated, as unreasonable as I am.

Mr. CLAPP. That is not what the senior Senator from Minnesota advocated.

Mr. NORRIS. I so understood him.

Mr. CLAPP. No; he advocated something entirely different.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I misunderstood him. The facts are that because it has this language in it, "as well as to the business of said grantee," it does not mean that if the business of the grantee is worth a million dollars—and I presume in a great many of these cases it will be worth several million dollars—the Secretary of War should or could charge him the value of that.

Why, if the Senator from Tennessee believes that, then he has made an admission here that means that under his bill, if it is passed without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i" in the way of a change, nobody will ever take out a permit under it, because under that construction it would mean that if the business was worth a million dollars you would have to pay a million dollars to the Government; if it was worth $20,000,000, you would have to pay $20,000,000 to the Government. That is wilder than any of these so-called conservationists and unreasonable men have ever advocated, either here or elsewhere.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator from Tennessee did not make that contention.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand that he did, but I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that he did.

Mr. CLAPP. No; he made the contention that the Senator said that the senior Senator from Minnesota did, namely, that you could keep, and only keep, within the limits of the value of the land.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I advocated, and that is what I have said over and over again, a number of times.

Mr. CLAPP. I was suggesting that it ought to be made plain. If it is intended that the business of the grantee shall be taken into account in considering the value of the land, it ought to relate to that rather than the counterrelation of taking into account the value of the improvement to navigation as well as the value to the business of the grantee. If it is the intention to take in account the value to the business of the grantee, that should be made plain. I have called the attention of the committee to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, does the Senator from Colorado intend to insist upon that amendment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me it changes the effect of the bill entirely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator says there is doubt about it, and it seems to me it clears it up just exactly in line with what the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Tennessee have said; so I think it ought to be there.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think if we are going to vote upon an amendment of that importance, which presents one of the most vital questions in the bill——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it has been discussed, and was discussed this morning, and a yea-and-nay vote was taken on the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. He made that claim, and said that that was the construction that was to be placed upon it, and the Senate adopted it upon that construction. It is exactly in line with what the Senator from Tennessee said and the Senator from Minnesota said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Nebraska was discussing another clause of the bill altogether. He did not refer to this clause.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; he proposed an amendment to strike out all of that. That is what he proposed to do. This is exactly clearing up the matter. It arose only from the fact that the Senator from Minnesota wanted to know its meaning, and the Senator from Tennessee said it meant only so far as the value of the land is concerned. I happened to write it down just in that language, and so I proposed this amendment to clear it up.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if I remember correctly, in the first Constitutional Convention they had a committee on form. It is to be regretted that we have not one in this body, so that these disputed questions could be submitted to it and cleared up without this interminable debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated. I happened to be out of the Chamber when it was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 26, after the word "grantee," it is proposed to insert "only so far as the value of the land is concerned."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, after all the contention there has been on this question and the care that apparently has been taken by the committee—I suppose in consultation with the representatives of prospective grantees under this bill—as to what would be satisfactory to those who wish to develop these water powers, the Senator from Colorado proposes to reopen the question here and make the bill more stringent than it has been heretofore against the public interest.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state that so far as I am concerned, I do not know any person that is applying for any of these water rights, and have no idea who is doing so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the entire time of men of talent and learning and ability and expertness in this matter has been devoted for two years, to my personal knowledge, to promoting the passage of this legislation. I did not say that the Senator from Colorado knew anything about it. I know about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not even on the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Washington to say that the experts in regard to water power and the proposed development met in consultation with the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I said that I supposed the committee, which devoted so much time to the framing of this bill, or the members of the committee, had consulted with them.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is wrong in his supposition. There were no hearings. There were no experts and no promoters called before the committee or consulted. There are abundant hearings and reports upon this subject that have been accumulating during the last 10 years. The committee consulted and studied all of those and the general subject and framed the bill as they thought best to promote the development of these water powers and protect the interest of the consumers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I said did not necessarily refer to hearings before a committee. I did not say anything about hearings before a committee or any formal appearance before a committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator said that the committee——

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator declined to yield to me a moment ago. I decline to yield to the Senator any further at this time.

It seems to me it would be a very curious thing if gentlemen seeking these franchises and coming here should speak to me in regard to what they wanted and state their views as to the forms of bills, and not speak to members of the committee. Furthermore, I know, Mr. President, since reflecting upon it after the Senator's remark, that they have appeared before some of the committees of Congress. I know that they appeared before the Committee on Public Lands and testified in regard to this general subject more than a year ago. They have had motion-picture shows here in the city and in other cities agitating public opinion and promoting legislation satisfactory to them.

I have not any objection to legislation being enacted that is satisfactory to them, if it is reasonable legislation. What started this remark was the fact that the committee had agreed upon this bill, presumably satisfactory to the gentlemen who want to promote the development of water powers, and certainly stringent enough, so far as curtailing the public interest is concerned. Now, why should it be made more so by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator just exactly the circumstances under which it occurred. The Senator from Minnesota came in and asked the Senator from Tennessee what this meant. The Senator from Tennessee said that it meant "so far as the land was concerned." That had been the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska this morning in moving to strike out entirely the part of the bill that related to this. He said that it meant that, and a yea-and-nay vote was taken upon it. The Senator from Minnesota said that it was not clear to him, and ought to be made clear. I then suggested the pending amendment and asked whether that made it clear, and the Senator from Minnesota said "yes."

Those are the circumstances under which it occurred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The effect of it is simply this: That the bill, as it is framed now and reported by the committee, and thrashed over here in debate for more than two weeks, and apparently accepted by the prospective grantees of these franchises, provides that in fixing the charges the Secretary of War can take into consideration the benefits accruing from the possession of this land to the business of the grantee. I think that is a reasonable provision. The amendment of the Senator restricts the basis upon which charges can be fixed, restricts the values which can be taken into account, and confines the Secretary to a consideration of the value of the land only.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the very argument that we have had here in connection with the motion of the Senator from Montana, by the amendment which he offered to strike out the words "value of the land," evidently went all over this matter; and the Senate determined by a yea-and-nay vote that you could not and should not charge for the water value that is in these streams, because it does not belong to the United States, and the United States has no more right to charge for it than I have. Upon that question a yea-and-nay vote was taken, and it was decided by a vote of 35 to 18. Then, again, the Senator from Nebraska moved to strike out this language, and the result of that was a vote of 38 to 20, I think. The matter has been settled twice so far as that is concerned; and when the interpretation of the Senator from Minnesota with relation to the matter was called to the attention of the chairman of the committee, the chairman of the committee explained it. Thereupon he said, "If that is the construction, it ought to be in there"; so I moved to put it in.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems to be assumed on the part of the advocates of the proposition that has just been stated by the Senator from Colorado that the promoters of water-power development are conferring a great favor upon the public and upon the United States by accepting these franchises; that they are of no great value; that they improve navigation. The assumption seems to be particularly from the argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] the other day that the Government was really indebted to them because of certain navigation that was developed. Mr. President, if the Government put in these dams for the purpose of improving navigation, the Government would not only have the improved navigation but it would have the water power to be disposed of. It is not a one-sided question by any means.

One of the men prominent in the development of water power who has been here a number of times is Mr. H. L. Cooper. I do not object to his having been here. The Senator from Tennessee resented the reference that I made to that as if there was something surreptitious or reprehensible about it. I do not think there was. I stated it for the purpose of showing, among other things, the value which these gentlemen attach to these franchises, evidenced by the fact that they are willing to give their time and labor for years to promoting legislation under which they are willing to accept them.

One of these gentlemen, as I say, is Mr. Cooper, a very honorable gentleman, so far as I know. He may be in the gallery now. He has been in the gallery at different times while this matter was before Congress. He is the engineer who constructed the dam at Keokuk, in the State of Iowa. He is regarded by a great many people as probably the foremost hydroelectric engineer in the country. He is interested in this legislation. I will say that in talking with him I formed the opinion that probably he was more reasonable in his attitude toward the interests of the public and the rights of the public in these matters than most of those who are seeking these franchises. He published an article in the Outlook Magazine a short time ago, and for the purpose of indicating, to some extent at least, the value which the franchises have to those who receive them I desire to read a short extract from his article. He says:

Water-power development in the United States is at a very low ebb, and many are asking why. The ever-rising standards of living make the demand for power greater each year. In 1850 we used three-tenths of a ton of coal per capita per annum; to-day we use twenty times as much, and most of this is for industrial power purposes. Seven hundred and fifty thousand miners produced the coal we consumed in 1913, at the rate of 760 tons per miner per annum. By the year 1940—

And by that time these franchises will be just about halfway through the period of their limitation under this act.

By the year 1940 we will probably be using 1,200,000,000 tons of coal per annum and require 1,600,000 miners. A practical economic question may well here arise. Have we the coal and what will be the probable cost of it? Statistics show that we have the coal for many years to come, but also show that the economical deposits are being worked first, and, as the coal becomes deeper, the costs increase rapidly.

Also it is realized by observing persons that the labor supply of the world is being rapidly destroyed, to what final extent no one can estimate. The best statisticians in Europe agree that when the war now raging is over at least 14,000,000 men will have been withdrawn from the world's field of labor. No one can deny that such a reduction in the supply of labor, together with the new political power the labor then remaining will possess, will create a corresponding increase in the demand for and cost of labor. This must result in a world-wide increase in the cost of coal and all other commodities.

It is unreasonable to suppose that Europe will permit itself to be further impoverished by emigration after the war has done its work, and the men left will be so badly needed at home. The tide Europeward will be stemmed only by an increase of wages in this country sufficient to keep our present foreign labor. If the foregoing is good reasoning, then are we not now in a zone of shortage of labor that will affect the coal supply and price and affect materially every other walk of life, especially agriculture and manufacturing?

The above question may well be asked. An analysis of Government statistics shows that where we are now paying $14.20 per capita per annum for coal for our population by 1940 we will be paying $22.60 per capita. This means a constantly increasing tax on all our people, from which they have the right to relief if relief is possible. Reliable data show that the efficiency of steam-power development has practically reached its maximum. If this is true, and the cost of coal is to go up and the needs of the people for power are constantly increasing, how can the situation be relieved? The answer is by the development of our water power as rapidly and as fully as it can be accomplished without any sacrifice of the public interest.

I agree with that statement, Mr. President—every particle of it. At least it can not be said to be overdrawn from the standpoint of a promoter of water-power development. Being true, it indicates that the franchises which will be granted under this bill are of incalculable value, yet the Senator from Colorado is higgling about the petty return which the Government will be enabled to charge for franchises without which it will be impossible for these people to develop these plants.

A very curious circumstance in this debate is the revolution of sentiment on the question of States' rights. It is quite interesting here to see New England leading the fight for States' rights, to see practically every Senator from that section of the country protesting against any power in the Federal Government, except what would necessarily arise under the strictest kind of a construction of the Federal Constitution, over plants which are developed in the navigable streams of the country, in which it must be admitted by everybody that where there are conflicting rights between the States and the Federal Government, in such cases the power of the Federal Government is supreme. Where the two jurisdictions cover the same subject matter the Federal power prevails.

This obsession of States' rights used to be confined to the South. Why was it? It was because at that time the only great and powerful private or special interest that existed in the country was established in the South—the special interest of slavery. If the Southern States had been opposed to the institution of slavery and the Nation as a whole had been in favor of it, the chief advocates of Federal power would have been found in the South, just as New England now is the section of strict construction when the great special and private interest of modern times—the General Electric Co., and similar institutions of that kind—are involved. It is not that I criticize them for changing their attitude. It is an evolution of industry and economics and the social and political conditions of the country. We have got to deal with and recognize the motives and causes of it.

This bill provides against the use of this power by a monopoly. I have just had sent to me from the Library of Congress a bound volume of the Literary Digest, a well-known magazine. I will send it to the desk and ask to have read by the Secretary the paragraph at the bottom of a page which I have marked with a pencil. I should like the Secretary to state the page and the date of the magazine, so as to identify it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the last advertising page, before page 797, of the Literary Digest of November 1, 1913:

Mr. POINDEXTER. In further reference to the uses and value of water-power plants for which permits will be given under this act—and the only reason why I refer to the value is that it is properly to be considered in connection with the particular clauses of this bill which we are now discussing as to charges, and as to the regulation of rates, and things of that kind—I read an editorial from the Spokesman-Review of Spokane, Wash.:

Great part of the undeveloped water power in the Western States is on the public lands of the United States. That is to say, the people own it. It is a tremendously valuable asset, and will grow in value with the passing of the years.

The railroads and other private interests have their eye upon this power. The railroads want much of it for the electrification of their lines. For that use alone it will have a value running into hundreds of millions of dollars. This is not mere conjecture. It is fact proclaimed by the railroads themselves. John D. Ryan, a director of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road, testified before the Senate Public Lands Committee in 1914 that:

"The railroad (the Milwaukee) will pay under contract for power delivered over 450 miles of its road something like $550,000 a year. It is paying now for coal to operate its steam trains over the same line approximately $1,750,000, and they furnish their own coal from mines on their own road, and one-third of their equipment is used in hauling coal to themselves, whereas with electric power there is not any such waste."

Henry J. Pierce—

I will interpolate here the remark that he is a very estimable gentleman, one who has been devoting his time to the promotion of this legislation, and so is a good witness, one whose motives from the standpoint of those interested in the free gift of this power can not be questioned—an exceptionally well-informed student of water-power development and uses in Europe and America, told the Portland conference last September that 48,700 miles of railroad are now operated in Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada.

On the basis of price paid by the Milwaukee for power in Montana—$550,000 yearly for 450 miles of road—these 48,700 miles of western railroad would use power annually to the value of $59,400,000. And in using electric power at that rate they would save annually, on the basis of Mr. Ryan's figures, $129,600,000 as against the use of coal.

That would give some indication, and from the most authoritative sources, of the value of these power sites which the Senator from Colorado wants to estimate merely upon the value as land. There is nothing in the bill which allows the State to tax this power. We refused the other day to strike out the language, upon the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which would enable the Secretary of War to make a reasonable charge without qualification or limitation. There is a provision in the bill which allows the State to tax the property, real, personal, and mixed, but it is extremely questionable whether that would apply to the intangible and unseen and unknown, not at all defined, agency of electricity.

So there is a great danger in striking out here all power of the Federal Government to tax and not putting into it any power for the State government to tax. The entire matter will fall into that twilight zone, that governmental vacuum, between the Federal power and the State power where these giant corporations—I have not any objection to them on account of their being giants, but I am referring to it as a fact—such as the General Electric Co., assume grotesque forms to play their sweet will with the interests of the public, escaping regulation upon either hand.

Every lawyer knows what he will be up against if he gets into a United States court and before a Federal judge in a case in which the State attempts to lay its hands in the way of levying a tax upon the agencies growing out of a permit granted by the Congress of the United States and out of water in a navigable stream, notwithstanding it is true that its use belongs to the States.

But, Mr. President, water flowing in a navigable stream as it is now is of no producing value in those places where dams will be erected under permits acquired by this act. It is the franchise of the Federal Government, enabling its beneficiaries to store the water, enabling them to create a water fall, acquiring power out of which will be produced electrical energy, which gives it value. If we deprive the Federal Government of the power of making charges upon it and restrict it in express terms to the value of the land granted as land, and provide it can not take into consideration the benefits to the grantee's business accruing from the possession of the land, it is very doubtful whether it will ever be taxed at all. It is very doubtful whether the State would ever succeed in enforcing a tax against the power which is developed under a plan which owes its existence to an act of Congress.

So I say the amendment of the Senator from Colorado goes to the very vitals of this bill. It is one of the most important questions in it. It changes the effect of the language which the bill now contains, and it ought to be defeated.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest, and I think the discussion has clarified this situation. I felt from the outset that there ought to be a charge not limited to the land. There was a question of construction of this provision, and feeling as I do, of course, I would not vote for the amendment limiting it. My object was to get a definite expression of the meaning of this language.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the speech which has been made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] refers to the fact that some people interested in this bill have been seeing others. I want to state to the Senator from Washington that I have not seen a single one of them; I never had a letter from a single one of them; I do not know a single one of them. There is not a navigable stream in my State, and consequently if there were any here they would not naturally have come to me.

But the Senator knows my views full well on these matters, and he knows full well that I have always opposed any charge upon the part of the Federal Government for that which does not belong to the United States, namely, the waters in these streams.

The Senator has referred to an article showing the limited amount of coal there is in existence and claiming high prices must follow. I do not know what knowledge the gentleman may have, but I do know that we have in the State of Colorado, according to the Geological Survey here in Washington, 371,000,000,000 tons of coal, which is enough to supply the world at the present rate of consumption for 300 years; and that in the State of Wyoming, according to the Geological Survey of the United States Government, there are 449,000,000,000 tons of coal, which is enough at the present rate of consumption to supply the world for over 400 years. If the Senator thinks, with enough in those two little States to supply the world for 700 years, that there will be a shortage in coal, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am much interested in the Senator's statement as to the amount of coal in Colorado. I recall, however, the fact that the great conservationist, Mr. Pinchot, said not many years ago that the supply of coal in this country would be exhausted in 29 years. The Senator does not agree to that?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; I do not agree to it. The difficulty with the position of the Senator from Washington is that under his theory of restrictions and royalties we never will get any of this water power developed. We have had these restrictions made by the conservationists, and what has been the result as shown by the Senator from Montana? There has been no development practically since the withdrawals of water-power sites in 1909, and you will not get any development under such a policy. He says that there ought to be a charge. There should not be a charge for water by the Government when it does not own any. It has no more right to demand a charge for water than have I. The State owns and controls the waters. The Federal jurisdiction is limited to the prevention of obstruction to navigation.

We have laws in the United States which will prohibit monopoly. There are utility commissions in the States to regulate these companies, and they will regulate them unless you tie them so close to the Federal Government that State authority can not control. They will be regulated in the States where the people are interested and desire reasonable prices for electrical power.

That can be left to the States. Why should the Government attempt to interpose and make a charge when such demands ever since 1909 have prevented development, whereas when such demands were not made enormous development in water power took place?

Mr. President, the Senator says there is no tax by the State provided in this bill. I should like the Senator to frame a provision making a State tax on these companies and see whether I will vote for it. I am in favor of the State taxing these corporations, and I must say that I think the bill does cover, as far as possible, the right of the State to tax these companies.

Mr. President, the very thing that the Senator has been trying to put into this bill may interfere with the State taxing these companies. Whenever you connect with a corporation something of a governmental agency it is not subject to taxation unless you expressly provide therefor in the bill. For that reason there is covered by the bill at least one strong, clear provision that such a company shall be the subject of taxation.

I think these companies ought to be made to pay the tax upon the property belonging to them, and as the State owns the water the tax ought to go there instead of to the United States Government.

Suppose a power plant is constructed at an expense of $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, ought that to escape taxation? Oh, no; it should not. But that tax ought not to be represented in the amount that the Government of the United States exacts as a charge, because it is the water that is of value, not the land. The United States Government may own the land, but it does not own the water. Whenever you get a tax out of the people you take it from the State and give it to the National Government, and the National Government is not entitled to it.

The State governments have their burdens, so much so that they are hampered in every way. I never realized, Mr. President, how seriously a State is hampered until I was governor of my State and tried to find where the revenue could be raised. I found that millions of acres of land had been withdrawn as Government reserves in my State and hence were not subject to taxation and never could become subject to taxation as long as the Federal Government holds them.

If we enact a provision here—and it is here—with relation to the taxing of these properties by the State, then you will find there is a remedy in the State by which it can get some revenue.

Mr. President, this very question has been settled on two votes of the Senate. It was settled first by the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] when he moved to strike out the language that the charges should be based upon the value as land. That was the provision which elicited the strong debate on this bill. He moved to strike out the words "based upon the value as land." He said if that remained in the bill the Government of the United States would not have the power to charge for water. That is true, and that vote was decided against the proposition to strike out that clause.

Again, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] this morning offered an amendment to strike out all of the balance of the paragraph, on the ground that it limited the charges to the value of the land, and his amendment was defeated.

Mr. President, it seems to me as there is a difference of opinion as to the interpretation that is to be placed upon the clause and it can be made clear by that language, it ought to be inserted. We do not want this subject confused, because if it is not clear you will not get the development desired, and you will have stagnation in the development of water power just as we have had in the last 10 years.

For these reasons, Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment ought to be adopted.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father Soul, above all, through all, and in us all, we thank Thee that we are so involved in Thy love that nothing can separate us from Thee but sin. Deliver us, we beseech Thee, from that, and impart unto us strength, courage, and fortitude, that we may dwell with Thee and work with Thee for the upbuilding of Thy kingdom among men, after the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATION ON THE POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution 149, making in order certain provisions of H. R. 10484, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, notwithstanding the general rules of the House of Representatives, having had the same under consideration, beg to report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

House resolution 149 (H. Rept. 261).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 10484, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and in such further consideration it shall be in order (the general rules of the House notwithstanding) to consider the following items in said bill:

Page 4, all of line 24, and the word "Service," line 25, as follows: "or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service."

Page 12, line 23, after the word "Service," as follows:

"Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National, State, and local holidays that are observed by other branches of the Federal Government."

Page 14, beginning with the word "Provided," line 7, to and including line 14, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary made between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and letter carriers assigned to delivery duty: And provided further, That letter carriers whose salaries have been reduced as the result of any order of the Post Office Department, making the maximum salary $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to collection duty, shall be restored to their former grades."

All of sections 7, 8, 9, 11, and 17, as follows:

"SEC. 7. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is applicable to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (ch. 370, 29 Stat. L., 262), and June 26, 1906 (ch. 3546, 34 Stat. L.,477).

SEC. 8. That so much of section 1 of the "Act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (ch. 1759, 33 Stat. L., p. 440), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails without postage stamps affixed quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter mailed at the special rates of 1 cent and 2 cents a copy, and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter, and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

SEC. 11. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

SEC. 17. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from and after the 1st day of July, 1916, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, and closed-pouch service.

Full railway post-office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post-office cars shall be for standard-sized cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Apartment railway post-office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post-office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department, as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried.

Closed-pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

For apartment railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 11 cents for each mile of service by a 30-foot apartment car and 6 cents for each mile of service by a 15-foot apartment car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

For storage-car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Where authorizations are made for cars of the standard lengths of 60, 30, and 15 feet, as provided by this act, and the railroad company is unable to furnish such cars of the length authorized, but furnishes cars of lesser length than those authorized, but which are determined by the department to be sufficient for the service, the Postmaster General may accept the same and pay only for the actual space furnished and used, the compensation to be not exceeding pro rata of that provided by this act for the standard length so authorized: Provided, That the Postmaster General may accept cars and apartments of greater length than those of the standard requested, but no compensation shall be allowed for such excess lengths.

For closed-pouch service, at not exceeding the following rates, when a 3-foot unit is authorized, a terminal charge of 50 cents for a round trip, or 25 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 1½ cents per mile for the authorized number of miles. When a 7-foot unit is authorized, a terminal charge of $1 for a round trip, or 50 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 3 cents per mile for the authorized number of miles.

The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise: Provided, That the Postmaster General in his discretion may relieve any of the roads of such service.

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act.

The initial and terminal rates provided for herein shall cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, lighting, heating, cleaning mail cars, and all other expenses incidental to station service and required by the Postmaster General in connection with the mails that are not included in the car-mile rate. The allowance for full railway post-office cars, apartment railway post-office cars, and storage cars may be varied in accordance with the approximate difference in their respective cost of construction and maintenance.

In computing the car-miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

In computing the car-miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

New service and additional service may be authorized at not exceeding the rates herein provided, and service may be reduced or discontinued with pro rata reductions in pay, as the needs of the Postal Service may require: Provided, That no additional pay shall be allowed for additional service unless specifically authorized by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized to make special contracts with the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails where, in his judgment, the conditions warrant the application of higher rates than those herein specified.

All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railway company not conforming to these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. Until July 1, 1917, in cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

Service over property owned or controlled by another company or a terminal company shall be considered service of the railroad company using such property and not that of the other or terminal company: Provided, That service over land-grant road shall be paid for as herein provided.

Railroad companies carrying mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation when required by the Postmaster General.

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates, and without extra charge therefor, the persons in charge of the mails when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General shall in all cases decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed. Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates, and with due speed, all mailable matter, equipment, and supplies directed to be carried thereon. If any such railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, equipment, and supplies when required by the Postmaster General on any train or trains it operates, such company shall be fined such reasonable amount as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of railroad companies carrying the mails under the provisions of this act for reduction in service or infrequency of service where, in his judgment, the importance of the facilities withdrawn or reduced requires it, and impose fines upon them for delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the value of the service in cases where it is not performed, and not exceeding three times its value if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the railroad company.

The provisions of this act shall apply to service operated by railroad companies partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

The provisions of this act respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit under oath, when and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, and hereafter detailed estimates shall be submitted for such services in the annual Book of Estimates.

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to return to the mails, when practicable for the utilization of car space paid for and not needed for the mails, postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the Postal Service.

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and, where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this act, to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

The Postmaster General may have the weights of mail taken on railroad mail routes, and computations of the average loads of the several classes of cars and other computations for statistical and administrative purposes made at such times as he may elect, and pay the expense thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

After the rates specified in this act shall have been adopted, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, whenever requested by the Postmaster General or by the representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying mail, make an investigation of the justice and reasonableness of rates then in effect, grant hearings to parties in interest, and report to Congress at the earliest practicable date thereafter the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein should be increased or decreased, and if either, how much. Such report shall show for each steam railroad operating company, if practicable, the amount of mail service rendered, the cost of performing same, and a comparison of the earnings of such railroad company from the mail traffic with those from express traffic and other passenger-train traffic. For the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, are hereby made available for the purposes of this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the gentleman on the other side if we can agree on a limit for debate of the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What time does the gentleman from Mississippi suggest?

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest about 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. GARNER. This matter has all been thrashed out already.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have demands for much more time than that on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. We had 16 hours of general debate on this bill, during which all of these questions were thoroughly discussed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have demands for more time for discussion of the rule. That has not been discussed. We can get on here with an hour on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the gentleman, under an agreement for an hour on a side, consent to the previous question being considered as ordered at the expiration of that time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I could not personally bind the Members on this side to such an agreement. There would be objection to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and one hour to be controlled by myself, and that at the expiration of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. For a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Reserving the right to object, that, of course, would prevent any amendments being offered to the rule.

Mr. HARRISON. It would.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman frankly that a great many of us would like to have an opportunity to have considered as an amendment to the rule a clause regarding the rural service. Is the gentleman willing to make that exception?

Mr. HARRISON. No; we could not consent to that, because it would open up the matter, and this bill has now occupied nearly two weeks of the time of the House. It would take too long.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand the situation; but it occurs to Members not only on this side but on your side as well that they ought to have an opportunity of considering such an amendment to the rule. For that reason——

Mr. HARRISON. We can not consent to open up the resolution to amendment, because there would be no end to the controversy, probably.

Mr. TOWNER. I was not going to ask to open it up generally to amendment, but for a particular amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand; but if we opened it up at all it would lead to requests to open it up for other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asks unanimous consent that debate on this rule be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and that at the end of that debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] objects.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 92.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 197, nays 157, answered "present" 4, not voting 76, as follows:

The name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the House (H. Res. 149) is practically the same resolution that was numbered H. Res. 114, which was introduced in the House on January 31, nearly a month ago. The only difference is that those provisions that were embodied in resolution 114 that made in order certain provisions of the Post Office appropriation bill which were not stricken out on points of order in the consideration of that measure but which were adopted are omitted in House resolution 149. There is but one exception to that proposition, and that is that the provision in the original resolution (H. Res. 114) relative to surety companies writing bonds for postal employees is omitted in this new resolution now being considered by the House.

There is nothing drastic in this rule. It can not be styled a gag rule. It will allow freedom of debate and freedom of amendment when the bill gets back to the Committee of the Whole, and we think the rule ought to be adopted. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order important legislation on an appropriation bill. The Post Office appropriation bill failed last year because of important legislation incorporated upon it. Another appropriation bill failed last year because of important legislation upon it. These two failures last year emphasized the bad policy of violating the rules of the House by incorporating important legislation on appropriation bills. The policy of attaching legislation to appropriation bills became so bad in 1836 that in 1837 the rule was adopted making it out of order to attach such legislation to appropriation bills.

Appropriation bills failed in 1836 because of important riders attached that were in no way a proper part of an appropriation bill. Every man who wants to get a joker into legislation waits and attaches it as a rider to an appropriation bill, if he can, because he knows that the appropriation bill must go through and that, therefore, his measure, called a rider, will go through if the Government shall be maintained by the appropriation. It is a vicious policy to follow. It is said that this legislation made in order to-day by this rule is very important. So it is. Being important, it ought to stand upon its merits and go through the committee as an independent bill, be considered in the Committee of the Whole as an independent bill, be considered in the House as an independent bill, be considered in the other end of the Capitol as an independent bill, and go to the President of the United States as an independent measure, so that he might exercise his constitutional right to veto the bill if he did not approve of it. The rider, made in order by this rule, will go through with this appropriation bill, carrying $320,000,000, not upon its merit, but upon the necessity of maintaining the Post Office Department.

And if another body should disagree with the House and the matter should remain in conference for a long period of time until the close of the session it may bring about again the same condition that we had last year in the failure of the Post Office appropriation bill. There is no defense that our Democratic brethern can make for this method of legislation except to say that they can not engineer an important piece of legislation out of a committee and into the House and through the Congress except they attach it as a rider upon an appropriation bill. The Post Office Committee will have nothing else to do for the remainder of this session. There is no reason why they can not take up important legislation and bring it into the House. Other committees of the House are required to do that. Every committee of the House could do as the Post Office Committee has done and is doing, ask for special rules and bring important legislation out of every committee of the House as riders upon appropriation bills. It would bring us into a chaotic condition in our legislation.

Thirty-nine States in the Union have adopted constitutional amendments prohibiting riders upon appropriation bills and enable the governor to veto special items in appropriation bills. The constitutions of those States require that every act shall be clearly indicated in its title, as it should be.

Within recent months one of the greatest commercial organizations in this country has taken up the question of riders on appropriation bills, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and has voted almost unanimously against the policy of attaching important legislation as riders upon appropriation bills, as shown by a recently made report by that organization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What do members of the so-called International Chamber of Commerce know about how business should be done or is done in the House of Representatives?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They know what a joker is, and the country knows, and they know that these jokers get in as riders on appropriation bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is a joker? I have seen none of those since the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman should have his eyes treated so that he can see them——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not in this Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL (continuing). If this bill goes through.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, if there is a man in this House whom it illy becomes to speak of riders and rules it is the gentleman from Kansas. For years he sat and voted for every sort of rule in reference to matters which were not only proper but matters entirely foreign to the subject matter of bills before the House. His statement that the Post Office appropriation bill failed because of legislation upon it is not correct. The legislation upon the Post Office appropriation bill was agreed to by the conference committee of the House and the Senate and carried the very provisions that are in this bill, and the only reason it failed was it was in the last days of the Senate and House meeting and there was no opportunity to present the conference report to the Senate on account of the pendency of the Indian appropriation bill, which took up the time. That is all there is to that. The House has passed upon all of this legislation and approved it. The bill it approved gave to the railroad companies $565,000 more than they have under the present law on the old basis of pay for railroads carrying the mail. This bill is more liberal. It carries more than $3,000,000 of additional compensation for the railroad companies on the changed basis of pay. Now, in the printing of this bill there was, by a misunderstanding or inadvertence, left out initial and terminal charges intended by the committee to be put in the bill, and a committee amendment will be offered to correct the mistake. These items alone will give $1,800,000 more for the railroads. There never was a fairer proposition than this bill. It permits something that was never done before. Wherever a railroad company is not getting as much as it ought to get under this bill it gives it the right to go to the Postmaster General and make a special contract for more. Where 51 per cent of the railroads think they are not getting enough they have the right to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission as guaranteed in this bill. Now, that is what the railroad companies have been contending for, the right to go there, but we have not been willing to yield the ultimate control over this question and allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to settle it without bringing the question back to the Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Being such a meritorious measure, would it not be possible for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report it and get it through the House as an independent measure?

Mr. MOON. It went through in this bill, and the gentleman knows, if he knows anything, that with the exception of three important bills within 40 years not a single material amendment to the Post Office law has been made except upon appropriation bills. Now, if the gentleman could have suggested that there is a single item in this bill that was foreign to the postal laws, foreign to the administration of the Post Office Department, he might have then been able to name a rider which he calls a joker, but every single item here is proposed as an amendment to the postal laws, and the gentleman knows that there are twenty-odd riders, as he calls them, on this bill, 17 independent sections——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MOON. There are 17 independent sections in this bill and 5 or 6 amendments subject to the point of order, every one absolutely material for the administration of that office. Now, it is unwise to undertake to do a thing in a foolish way. The gentleman knows very well we could not introduce 25 separate bills for the benefit of this department and pass them separately in this House, not half of them. The only way to get consideration of these measures that meet the judgment and approval of this House connected with this department is upon a bill which provides for the support and maintenance of the department and under which laws upon appropriation bills, in my judgment, become necessary for the conduct of that department.

I want to say that the bonding feature of this bill is a very material proposition and is one that has not been fully discussed before the Congress, and from the petitions which have been presented to this body on that question, and out of deference to the judgment of the gentlemen over there and over here who think there ought to be some further discussion upon that question, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads suggested a change in the rule, and that proposition does not come before the House now. It is left out of the amended rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The last I knew anything about the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads they voted to make the insurance proposition a part of the bill as a rider.

Mr. MOON. The committee did that in the first instance; but I will say to the gentleman that yesterday evening a quorum of the Post Office Committee directed the very action that is now being taken.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why did not the chairman notify the members of the committee? I was on the floor all day yesterday.

Mr. MOON. We notified everybody we could. I thought you were present.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was in the restaurant only 15 minutes to get luncheon, and that was the only time I was absent from the floor of the House yesterday.

Mr. MOON. No formal notice was issued to anybody. After the committee rose the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads informally met and determined it was best to leave that section out of the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me it was due me from the gentleman to notify me to that effect.

Mr. MOON. I notified everybody who could be found. I would have notified you if I could. Really, I thought the gentleman was present.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the gag tactics that have been applied by the majority side to this important measure it is well to waste no time in preliminaries, but to call a spade a spade and use plain langage.

There is contained in the bill different provisions, consisting of some 20 different "riders" that seek to enact legislation of the utmost importance in connection with the passage of this appropriation bill.

The general consensus of opinion of the country is to the effect that a "rider" is an unfair, improper, and unjust method of legislation.

Speaking in a legislative sense, a rider is always a coward and usually a bully. It is a coward, because it does not come into the House on its own feet, but hiding behind this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In this instance this important legislation comes into this House fastened as a rider upon a bill, providing for nearly one-third of the expenditures of the Government.

It comes like a sheep tick upon a ram.

This course prevents any discussion or consideration at this time of the provisions of such riders whatsoever, and when a minority of the committee now unanimously desire to discuss the provisions of this measure the gag rule is applied by the majority side and the right is denied.

Now, it makes no difference what we as Members of Congress may think upon this subject at this time, but it is true that the unanimous sentiment of the country is and has been, and will be again in November, against the passage of such legislation in such a manner.

Gentlemen may sit here very snugly and very complacently and say that the matter will not then be remembered or considered by those who are the patrons of the post offices, particularly with reference to the rural free-delivery system, that is unfairly and improperly treated by this bill. But if they do so they are mistaken.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, that the patrons of the rural free delivery are aroused to the last degree against the manifest injustices that have been perpetrated by this administration and that are approved in this bill and which are here denied correction. [Applause on the Republican side.] There will be no patience on the part of the voters at the polls on this subject, and the people will hold to account those who are responsible therefor.

There is no question but that the matter of "riders" in legislative bills has been frequently before the country. There is no question that the sentiment against it has been increasing and growing; and to say on the majority side of this House that the important provisions of this bill shall be thrust down the throats of the membership and the minority and of the people of this country without proper chance for consideration makes of the rider, as I have said, a bully, for, like a bully, it says, "Accept the general provisions of this bill, accept the different 'riders,' accept the general legislation that is contained in such 'riders' or the Post Office Department will be starved."

Now, the gentlemen upon the other side of this House at the beginning of this session, over the protest of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and other Members upon this floor, enacted the rules of this House, and among others was Rule XXI, section 2, which says that an appropriation bill shall not contain matters of general legislation. Their attention was called to this situation and it was suggested that the rules be revised, and still they insisted upon adopting the rule; and now, as upon many other occasions, they seek to violate it because, as was stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] yesterday, 99 per cent of the legislation of the Post Office Department has been enacted in the past in the form of riders.

If so, it was known to them at the time they framed the rule, and the rule could have been framed accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, there is a protest on the part of the membership on this side of the House, and we do protest, against the methods of the majority, who say that they will not allow free discussion of this rule upon this floor and fair consideration of the merits of this bill; that it must be taken in its entirety because, forsooth, they have the legislative power to thrust it down the throats of the minority side of this House.

The practice and legislative history with reference to "riders" is stated by Hinds as follows:

A rule forbids in a general appropriation bill any appropriation not previously authorized by law, unless for continuation of works or objects in progress.

A rule forbids any legislative provision in a general appropriation bill.

The old form of rule which admitted on appropriation bills legislation intended to retrench expenditures.

Section 2 of Rule XXI makes provision against legislation in general appropriation bills, as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto."

The origin of this rule is found about the year 1835. On December 10 of that year the delays of the appropriation bills were discussed, from which it appears that an important cause of that delay was the practice of including in the bills matters of legislation. Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, suggested at this time the desirability of a plan that the bills should "be stripped of everything but the appropriations." The fortifications appropriation bill failed at the preceding session to become a law because the Senate would not agree to a provision for $3,000,000 to be disbursed by the President for certain extraordinary military and naval purposes. On January 5, 1836, the Committee on Rules recommended a rule in this language:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law."

The House, however, did not adopt the rule at that time, and on February 25, 1837, Mr. John Bell, of Tennessee, secured the addition to the fortifications bill of a "rider" to provide for the distribution of the surplus in the National Treasury. This caused the loss of the bill, the Senate adhering to its opposition. Apparently aroused by this result, in the next Congress, on September 14, 1837, the House agreed to the rule which the Committee on Rules had proposed in 1836.

In the year following the adoption of the rule, while the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was under consideration, certain legislation was attempted by an amendment in relation to the salaries of custom officials, and which also included a provision for refurnishing the President's house.

The rule being invoked, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled the amendment out of order. On the succeeding day, March 8, 1838, Mr. George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, after referring to the difficulty which arose on the preceding day, proposed the following addition to the rule, which was agreed to a few days later, March 13, 1838:

"Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

With this amendment the rule remained in operation for 38 years, until 1876, when, at the suggestion of Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, the House adopted the following rule:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures."

The debate on the adoption of this form of rule shows that the old rule had been construed to permit increase of salaries, but not decrease. Although jealousy of increased power which might come to the Committee on Appropriations as a result was manifested, it was agreed to by the House, Messrs. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, and James A. Garfield, of Ohio, asking for it, with the especial object of enabling the Appropriations Committee to report in their bills reductions of salaries.

When the rules were revised in 1880 the Committee on Rules, not being agreed as to the proper changes, reported the form of 1876. But when the subject came before the House, after long and learned debate, the following form, suggested by Mr. William R. Morrison, of Illinois, was agreed to:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures."

The rule adopted in 1880 remained in use five years, until the adoption of the rules in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. The admission of a certain class of riders had caused some opposition to the old rule, and the Committee on Rules recommended the following:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

This form the House, on motion of Mr. George E. Adams, of Illinois, modified by striking out the words "and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government" and inserting:

"Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation or in any amendment thereto."

Thus the rule was adopted in its present form, which it has retained since, with the exception for the four years of the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, when there was a return to the form adopted in 1880, with a slight modification relating to reports of commissions in the proviso. (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 4, pp. 382–385.)

The practice of attaching "riders" to appropriation bills has been often condemned.

In 1879 President Hayes sent a message to the Congress dealing with this question, where, among other things, he said:

The practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail till more than 40 years after the adoption of the Constitution. It has become a common practice. All parties when in power have adopted it. Many abuses and great waste of public money have in this way crept into appropriation bills. The public opinion of the country is against it. The States which have recently adopted constitutions have generally provided a remedy for the evil by enacting that no law shall contain more than one subject, which shall be plainly expressed in its title. The constitutions of more than half the States contain substantially this provision. The public welfare will be promoted in many ways by a return to the early practice of the Government and to the true principle of legislation, which requires that every measure shall stand or fall according to its merits.

If it were understood that to attach to an appropriation bill a measure irrelevant to the general object of the bill would imperil and probably prevent its final passage and approval, a valuable reform in parliamentary practice of Congress would be accomplished. (Message of Apr. 29, 1879.)

In his Introduction to Political Parties and Practical Politics, page 419, Mr. Orman says:

Amendments called "riders," embodying legislation disapproved by the President, are sometimes attached to appropriation bills. The President is then forced to accept this obnoxious amendment or to veto the entire bill. The practice of attaching "riders" is somewhat discredited and is usually tried only as a last resource.

Prof. Fairlie, in his work, The National Administration of the United States of American, pages 51 and 52, says:

The attempt has, however, been made to use the money power of Congress to coerce the President in another way—by attaching as "riders" to the appropriation bills items of general legislation which the President would veto if presented as separate bills. But in 1879 President Hayes vetoed appropriation bills to which riders were attached and threw the responsibility back on Congress, so that they were compelled to repass the appropriations without the riders.

Hon. Samuel W. McCall, formerly of this House, in his book, The Business of Congress, pages 114 to 117, makes the following statement:

Revenue and appropriation bills are read in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs, and at the conclusion of the reading of each paragraph amendments are in order, but no amendment can be offered to a general appropriation bill, whether ordinarily it might be germane to the bill or not, unless it is for an expenditure authorized by law, except in cases where it is a continuation of former appropriations and of objects such as are already in progress; nor is any amendment changing existing law in order upon any general appropriation bill. These prohibitions likewise govern the committee in preparing the bill. The object of the prohibition is to prevent the practice once existing of putting "riders" upon the money bills. These bills provide for the support of the Government for a given fiscal year or for deficiencies in expenditures for previous years, and it is their essential purpose to provide money for keeping the governmental machinery in motion. Amendments germane to these bills, dealing, as they do, with all details of Government, might propose changes in the greater portion of the laws of the United States. If it were only necessary for an amendment to be germane, in the consideration of the Army and Navy appropriation bills, conditions might be imposed upon the use of those two arms of the service which might affect the whole foreign policy of the Government. The departments of the civil service generally would be liable to a complete reconstruction every year, and even private claims might be pressed for payment upon general money bills.

The rules contemplate that changes in general laws shall be made by bills introduced for that purpose, referred to the appropriate committees, and considered on their merits in the House. Legislation of a general character, either by way of changing existing laws or by adding new laws to them, would be likely to be crude and unscientific if added to supply bills, and it would have the effect also of impeding the passage of those necessary measures. There is no analogy between conditions with us and under those systems where, in former times, parliaments voted money to the king only on condition that he should grant something to the people. In such a case the conditional grant was used to wring from the sovereign some of the privileges of a free constitution and an extension of popular rights. But with us the President himself holds office for a limited term, and under the same sanctions as do Members of Congress, and he may be retired at the next election and a successor chosen. The Army and Navy and the civil service do not belong to him, but to the Nation. And for Congress to attempt to coerce a coordinate branch of the Government by threatening to starve the departments and to stop the governmental machine by refusing to vote necessary supplies savors very much of revolution.

An editorial in the World's Work, August, 1913, pages 379–380, says:

The much-discussed "rider" to the sundry civil bill was such a flagrant example of a vicious method of legislation that it has at last turned public attention and public condemnation toward this old evil.

This particular "rider" specified that none of the money appropriated in the sundry civil bill to enforce the Sherman Act should be used to prosecute farmers' societies or labor unions. Giving Congress the benefit of every doubt and considering this a bona fide attempt to modify the Sherman Act, if the authors of this "rider" did not know that the principles underlying it were probably unconstitutional and that the "rider" itself was ineffective they certainly should have known that amendments to the Sherman Act should be passed as such and not inserted in an appropriation bill.

If, on the other hand, it was an attempt to curry favor with the farmers and the labor unions by seeming to grant them immunity from the law, though it really gave them nothing, it was a dishonest trick.

Wise leadership in the farmers' societies and labor organizations would have made them take this occasion to say that they wanted no special favors before the law, for this seemingly attempted discrimination on their behalf, inferentially at least, puts them in the class of "special interests." And in getting into the "special-interest" class they have provoked the President into a special statement that wherever they break the law they will be prosecuted. This will be a new condition, for labor unions have violated the Sherman Act with impunity, so far as suits instituted by the Department of Justice are concerned. The President has specifically promised that this shall happen no more.

Except for the President's statement there is nothing to recommend this "rider" to the public.

From the partisan standpoint it is likewise incomprehensible—a Democratic Congress putting a Democratic President in an embarrassing position. Congress must have known that the President would do just what he did; that since the objectionable clause was ineffective to accomplish discrimination—there being other money available to prosecute possible violations of the law—he would sign the bill and at the same time issue a statement which would do more than all previous discussion to call down on it the public condemnation that it deserves.

A study of the consequences of vetoing a sundry civil appropriation bill within a few days of the end of the Government's fiscal year, with a tariff bill still in the throes of passage and a currency bill just being introduced would convince any unprejudiced person that it would have been an unwise thing to do.

The net result of the whole performance is a crystallization of opinion against "riders" in legislation and a new pronouncement that the Government will enforce the Sherman Act against labor unions. To attempt, even for a year, to limit the scope of the Sherman Act by a subterfuge like a "rider" is an utterly unjustifiable action.

It should be noted that the Attorney General's scheme to add to the strength of the Government's control over the tobacco industry by putting a special taxing clause in the tariff bill was based on the same fundamentally unsound idea. Such a clause had no proper place in the tariff bill, and happily it was omitted. An appropriation bill should be only an appropriation bill. A tariff act should be only a tariff act, and an act to regulate business should do that and nothing more. If a bill can pass on its own merits it ought to pass that way. If it can not, it ought not to be allowed to "hitch on" to some other popular measure and to ride through on its back.

The machinery of legislation is complicated and difficult to tinker with, but in the last few years we have improved various other parts of our political machinery so much that we should be sanguine of the ability of Congress to improve its methods. Of the need of doing so, no more "horrible example" is needed than the rider on the appropriation bill. Its particular significance is that, though it is not worse than others that have gone before, it is more notorious. The public's mind has been focused on it.

The enforcement of the Sherman Act against combinations of labor has not been accomplished by the Department of Justice. There have been many suits against labor unions and their officials, but it is hard to find one started by the Government. The violations of the Sherman Act by labor unions is probably no worse now than it has been. The difference is that the President has promised that the unions shall not longer have immunity.

In the World's Work of March, 1914, pages 491 and 492, the following is found:

About 10 years ago Mr. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, at present United States Senator from Oregon, was made governor of that State. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered office with one fixed idea—to end an abuse which had disgraced Oregon for a generation, and which still disgraces many other Commonwealth. Every year, for a generation, the general appropriation bill had reached the governor overburdened with a large quantity of extraneous details. Every legislator who had an ax to grind usually attached it to this indispensable measure. The bill was then passed in the last hours of the session, and the governor had to sign it or allow the State to go without appropriations for two years. He had no right to veto particular items; he must approve or disapprove as a whole.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN announced early in his term that he would not hesitate to veto any appropriation bill that came to him loaded with these "riders."

"Will you kill the appropriation bill," the lawmakers asked, "and deprive all the State employees of their salaries, put an end to the work of all the State departments, stop paying interest on the State bonds—make the State, as a financial organization, go out of business?"

"That's exactly what I will do," retorted the governor. "If you people in the legislature wish to take the responsibility of closing up the State of Oregon you can do so. I will not sign that bill."

The warfare lasted almost to the midnight of the day the legislature was scheduled to adjourn; at the last moment the frightened lawmakers, seeing that Gov. CHAMBERLAIN was in earnest and that the people were supporting him, changed their tactics, cut out all the objectionable items, and sent him the first clean appropriation bill that Oregon had ever passed. The governor's act had two interesting consequences. It made Mr. CHAMBERLAIN so popular that the people sent him to the United States Senate. It resulted in an amendment to the State constitution giving the governor power to veto any item in an appropriation bill. The abuse of "riders" in Oregon is at an end.

This episode has a national significance. All Congresses have sinned this way, and the present Democratic majority has done so on several occasions. Several months ago by an appropriation rider, they virtually sought to repeal the Sherman Act in its application to labor unions. In order that the Nation might continue in business, Mr. Wilson signed this bill, but under protest. More recently, Congress has attempted, through the devious process of an appropriation bill, to exempt second-class postmasters from the operations of the civil-service law. Mr. Wilson has apparently succeeded, for the time at least, in checking this particular onslaught. But the rider is too useful a legislative device to rest permanently unused upon the shelf. Probably we shall not be rid of its pernicious influence until a President, by some such spectacular device as Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S, shall focus the attention of the country upon its evil effects.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimouse consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein the comments of various authors and magazines in this country upon the subject of riders in connection with legislative matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing whatever in this rule that has any relation to the rural free delivery of the mails, notwithstanding the statement of my colleague [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] on that subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the time.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. That is the objection I make to it; that it has nothing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the rural delivery proposition has been taken care of in the bill as it never has been taken care of before. No such treatment of the rural delivery question has ever been given to that question in this House as was given to it the other day when the amendment was adopted providing that no rural delivery route should be changed in any way except upon the application or petition of a majority of the residents along the route.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. This rule proposes important and necessary legislation, and the most important legislation in connection with that rule is that provision effecting the restoration of the carriers to their former status by reason of their reduction in compensation.

The next important thing before the American people, and one of the most vital that has ever come before the country, is the compensation to be paid to the steam railroads of the country for carrying the mails. They have heretofore been paid for carrying the mail by the ton. They are getting to-day 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail they carry, and in this bill it is proposed to pay them 12.17 cents per ton-mile.

Are they getting enough pay under this rule? I think they are.

Then it is proposed, in order that there may be no injustice done to the railroads, later on and during the consideration of this measure, to offer an amendment which will limit the weight of the parcel post to 50 pounds. That will nullify the argument of the railroad companies to the effect that their freight will be diverted to the mail trains. There can be absolutely no reason why every man in this House ought not to vote for this rule. Why? Because we are making in order the consideration of a measure by means of which the Government can carry its mail on a scientific basis. We are making in order a measure that will give full consideration, every line of which will be open for amendment and debate. There will be no gag rule applied to the consideration of this question. [Applause.]

It will be before the House for consideration. No gag will be applied. No man can say that this will be considered under any gag rule. This rule now before the House simply makes the measure in order to the end that it may be considered in an orderly way, with proper consideration and with every opportunity afforded for amendment that any man on this floor sees fit to apply. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to print in extension of my remarks the amendment that I desire to offer to this rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the amendment he intended to offer if he got a chance. [Laughter.] Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the amendment referred to:

Mr. TOWNER moves to amend, page 2, line 14, by adding the following as a new paragraph:

"That hereafter in the Rural Service a standard of length for horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads shall be established which shall be 24 miles, and that all rural mail routes now established on dirt roads which exceed such standard length by 20 per cent or more shall be reorganized to conform approximately to such standard, and that all rural routes of this class which shall hereafter be established shall conform approximately to such standard and not exceed by 20 per cent or more such standard length of 24 miles; that a standard of length for motor-vehicle rural mail routes shall be established which shall be 50 miles, and such routes shall be established only on hard-surfaced roads; that all motor-vehicle routes now established on dirt roads shall be discontinued and reorganized to conform to the standard for horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads, and that hereafter no motor-vehicle mail routes shall be established except on hard-surfaced roads; that no rural mail routes of either class shall hereafter be reorganized or established which shall exceed in length by 20 per cent or more the standards herein fixed. No order shall be made and nothing herein contained shall be interpreted to prevent the use by the carrier of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes on dirt roads."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I think the majority will hardly be justified in going to the country on the proposition that it will not allow any consideration even of the very important question of restoring the Rural Route Service to what it was before the reorganization of the department. That is what you are doing to-day by refusing consideration of this amendment to the rule.

It may be said that riders on appropriation bills ought not to be passed. But, gentlemen, if riders on appropriation bills under a rule are to be submitted, I think you will hardly be able to justify your bringing in a rule for the consideration of such matters as giving the privilege to the Postmaster General of returning empty mail bags and not allowing consideration of a rule that vitally affects the interests of millions of the farmers of this country.

That is the position, gentlemen, in which you will place yourselves if you adopt this rule in this form, and I suggest that every man that is interested in the restoration of the Rural Route Service to what it was before the reorganization scheme was adopted by the present department will have difficulty in explaining to his constituents why he votes for a rule that will prevent even the consideration of a proposition of this kind. A vote for the rule now means a vote to refuse to even consider legislation that will prevent the serious injury, if not the utter destruction of the Rural Route Service. At least the House ought to have a chance to consider the question, and, if possible, secure legislation that will remedy the evil.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has 5 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. We shall probably have but one more on this side. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is recognized.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that under this rule we shall have a chance to restore to the mail collectors their salaries which have been reduced. I can not see the reason nor justice for such reduction and will certainly vote for its restoration. I am glad the committee has seen fit to eliminate the bond features from this rule, to launch the Government into the bonding business, an enterprise which it has never engaged in before, because I believe the private companies can better do this work than the Government can perform it. And, Mr. Speaker, having but little time, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as long as the gentlemen have put the gag on us and refused to let us discuss the rule on this side, I am not willing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman permitted a gentleman on that side to have the privilege of extending his remarks. That is inconsistent.

Mr. MANN. That is not inconsistent at all. I am not like the gentleman from New York. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to gentlemen who feel like my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] that they have gained a victory in relation to the bonding privilege, that they should read the remarks of that gentleman who lived some thousands of years ago, who said, "Another such victory and we are undone." [Laughter.]

What is going to happen to them is this: The committee will try this year to pass the railway-mail provision, because they think they can not pass both the railway-mail provision and the bonding provision in the same rule. Next year, having gotten the railway-mail pay provision out of the way, they will come in with the bonding provision all alone, and the last state of the gentleman from Maryland and his friends will be worse than the first. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman know that in the Sixty-first Congress a Republican House passed a bonding provision which applied to all of the departments, and it was passed by an overwhelming majority?

Mr. BENNET. We did; and I am glad my colleague reminds me of that. I voted for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should the gentleman complain about this, then?

Mr. BENNET. I am going to give the gentleman a little history.

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. No; not until I answer this question. My colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] reminds me that I voted for that rule. I did. I had been elected in 1908 by 8,000 majority. That side in the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congress called the attention of the country to the evil of legislation on appropriation bills under special rule. What was the result of that? My great independent district in 1910 did what other great independent districts represented here by Democrats are going to do in 1916. They beat me by 2,000. [Laughter.] Yes; I voted for the rule. You are going to vote for this rule. Good-bye! God bless you! [Laughter.]

Mr. COADY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. COADY. I was going to ask the gentleman if he is complaining about section 2 being stricken out of the bill?

Mr. BENNET. I do not know what section 2 is.

Mr. COADY. I fell sorry for the gentleman. He discussed it the other day.

Mr. BENNET. No; I made a point of order on it, because I did not know what it was. It is like section 7 in this rule. We on this side tried for an hour to find out what it was, and there was not a man on that side who knew what it was.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was there no other cause that contributed to the gentleman's defeat except the fact that he voted for that rule?

Mr. BENNET. That was enough. [Laughter.] That was enough, I will say to my friend, and he can remember it the morning after the election of 1916 also, although I am frank to say that I hope not in his personal case. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee said that the only way you can get legislation through this House in relation to the Post Office is on an appropriation bill under a special rule. I represent the largest Democratic congressional district in the United States, and I resent the inference that the Democrats are stupid. They are not. They are intelligent. I concede that they are in my district.

Mr. GORDON. Except in 1910. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. But in the Sixty-third Congress the Post Office Committee reported out four bills carrying legislation. All four passed. Three became laws and one was vetoed by the President of the United States. They tried to pass legislation on an appropriation bill, and that failed.

Now, I will tell you some more things that you will be doing if you vote for this rule. I assume from the vote on the previous question that you are going to vote for the rule. You are going to prevent the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] from offering his amendment in relation to the Rural Free Delivery, which I do not at all understand, but which seems to be important to rural communities.

Mr. GORDON. Are you in favor of it?

Mr. BENNET. I will discuss it if you will vote to put it in; but I will tell you what you are going to bar from consideration which I do know something about——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Is there any time remaining on the other side?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on that side contend that the rule now before the House is a gag rule. It seems to some of us that it comes in very poor taste for Republicans to talk about gag rules. There is no gag about this rule. It allows this House to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and discuss these features of the bill, with freedom of amendment and freedom of debate. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has said that he is going to allow great liberality of debate and freedom of amendment. It can not be said therefore that there is any gag rule here. Let me cite the gentleman to the fact that in the Fifty-ninth Congress, when the Republicans were in control of this House, when the Post Office appropriation bill was before the House, there had been many points of order made to many of the provisions of the bill which struck many provisions from the bill. A Republican Committee on Rules brought in a rule which provided that all the provisions—10 or 12 of them—might be considered and not be subject to a point of order; but instead of allowing liberality of debate and freedom of amendment, as we propose here, that rule proposed by your Rules Committee prevented any amendment being offered to any part of those provisions or any discussion of them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only that. That was bad enough, and was truly a gag rule; but in the Sixty-first Congress the gentleman from New York, who now tirades against this rule, and styles it a gag rule, did vote for a rule that was most obnoxious. Ah, he says he was defeated because of it. There are many other gentlemen on that side who were not defeated in that election, and who voted for it. What was it? It was a rule that was brought into this House by your Rules Committee in the tariff debate in the Sixty-first Congress that prevented any amendment except on five articles in the tariff bill being considered; and again when that bill came back from the Senate with 864 amendments, and most obnoxious amendments, too, a Republican Committee on Rules brought in a rule here, and you Republicans voted for it, that prevented any discussion of any of those amendments in the House, but immediately sent them to conference. That is your record in this House. Gentlemen talk about no good legislation being passed on general appropriation bills, and they say that there is no opportunity for freedom of discussion. Let me cite you to the fact that the first provision for the Rural Free Delivery Service was brought in on a general Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not yield to the gentleman right now.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman will certainly be as courteous as I was.

Mr. HARRISON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that under the rules of the House it is within the power of any Member to move to close debate in Committee of the Whole upon this whole railway mail proposition, covering 12 pages, after the expiration of one speech of five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Why, yes; they can do that under the rules of the House, but the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill has stated that there will be great liberality of debate given to Members in the discussion of that proposition, and this is no new matter before the House. It was up in the Sixty-third Congress. It passed this House, it passed the Senate, and I understand the conferees had gotten together on this provision and it would have been reported to the House and adopted had it not been for the closing hours of that session.

Mr. MOON. It was reported to the House, and the conference report was agreed to in the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. It is within the power of the chairman of the committee to move to close debate, but it is within the power of the House to refuse to close debate.

Mr. BENNET. But it is absolutely in the power of the chairman to make that motion in five minutes on a 12-page amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. And absolutely within the power of the House to refuse to agree to it.

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman permit a further suggestion?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. That very rule to which the gentleman refers was brought into the House to make in order upon the Post Office appropriation bill in the Fifty-ninth Congress various matters which had gone out on points of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON]. Mr. Overstreet, of Indiana, was the chairman of the committee, and the rule that was brought in provided that they should be in order. Not only that, but it provided that there should not be any amendment offered. The gentleman voted for that rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I will ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the speech of Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, in connection with that rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to that. I will read what the gentleman from Mississippi said in the discussion of that rule.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the whole speech be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER. It is already in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BENNET. I thought the gentleman yielded for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was recognized to ask a question.

Mr. HARRISON. Here is what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was at that time minority leader, said: "But at the same time the Democrats find themselves unable to support the rule, because the rule cuts off all amendment."

And, again, Mr. Speaker, not only was there brought into this House under a general appropriation bill the first provision for the establishment of the rural delivery route, but the Parcel Post System would never have been enacted into law, probably, if it had not been brought in on a general appropriation bill. And so it is, all through the history of legislation in this House it will be found that some of the best legislation that has been written upon the statute books has come about through being enacted on a general appropriation bill. The trouble about the Republicans was that they used the rules of the House to pass bad legislation and strangle and prevent freedom of amendment and debate, while we are trying to pass, through the rules of this House, good and wholesome legislation, under most liberal debate and freedom of amendment. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CAMPBELL) there were—ayes 119, noes 104.

So the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. MORIN, indefinitely, on account of illness.

CORRECTIONS IN A VOTE.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I overlooked the fact that I was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] when I voted on the previous question. I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and be recorded "present."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] states that he overlooked the fact that he was paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and voted on ordering the previous question, and has asked to withdraw his vote and be recorded "present." Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. STEELE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I also overlooked the fact upon that vote that I was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COSTELLO], and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE] also overlooked the fact that he was paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COSTELLO], and asks unanimous consent to withdraw his vote and be recorded "present." Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9416. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 157. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 157. An act to extend the time for the completion of dams across the Savannah River by authority granted to Twin City Power Co. by an act approved February 29, 1908, as amended by act approved June 3, 1912; and

H. R. 9416. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior years, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RUBEY was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Robert Jolly (H. R. 7693, 63d Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule which has been adopted the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first item affected by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, all of line 24, and the word "Service," line 25, as follows: or any other classified civil-service employee in the Postal Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment offered under the rule. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. When this item was under consideration originally in Committee of the Whole, it was admitted by the members of the Post Office Committee that the phraseology in the amendment now under consideration did not include the class of post-office laborers. They constitute a body of some twelve hundred or more employees, and they are as worthy a class of postal employees as any, and certainly deserve the protection covered by this item. Next to the railway mail clerks, they are engaged in more hazardous employment than any other class of employees. These post-office laborers are not civil-service employees. Under this item we are covering in all of the postal employees in the civil service, and some who are not. For instance, the special-delivery messengers are not in the civil service, and yet it is proposed to grant to the widows and dependent relatives of those messengers a $2,000 indemnity in case of death, or, in case of disability lasting a year, a year's salary, and if the disability lasts longer than that time, one-half a year's salary. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he does not think that these very worthy laborers should be included under the protecting arm of this provision? These men are employed in handling mail bags weighing from 150 to 200 pounds, carrying them on trucks to elevators, and are constantly exposed to danger.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has made a speech. I thought he was going to ask a question. What is the question?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had been paying any attention he would know what the purport of my inquiry is, but I will try to inform him again at the sacrifice of the time of the committee.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman sacrificed enough time before he got to his question to ask forty.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is sometimes necessary when I am trying to obtain information about this bill from gentlemen on this committee.

Mr. MOON. Perhaps the gentleman would better get it somewhere else.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may have to.

Mr. MOON. Now, I will answer the question of the gentleman. If I understand him he wants to know from me if I do not think laborers ought to be included in this.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is my query.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection in the world to it myself, but that is not the proposition before the House. The language of the bill is those under the classified service.

Mr. STAFFORD. And post-office laborers are not included in the civil service. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment and withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 24, after the word "employee," insert "and post-office laborer."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think I have already sufficiently explained——

Mr. MANN. If you say a post-office laborer in the Postal Service, that is superfluous, is it not? I simply invite the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should think "and laborer in the Postal Service" would be sufficient, without further description.

Mr. MANN. If that would be, all right; but I do not think we ought to use superfluous language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out of the amendment offered the words "post office."

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the words "post office." Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on it. I do not know if it is subject to a point of order; but I would like to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee is too late.

Mr. MOON. No; the gentleman has just withdrawn it and offered an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. If there are going to be any points of order reserved, I must object——

Mr. MOON. I do not know the point of order is well taken. I understood the gentleman to say he wants to strike out all reference to post offices——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman please, my original amendment designated those laborers as post-office laborers.

Mr. MOON. They were designated as post-office laborers?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois points out the fact that it would not be necessary to insert the word "post-office," for the language following it says "in the Postal Service."

Mr. MOON. I do not think it would be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the reason for my asking unanimous consent to withdraw the word "post-office."

Mr. MOON. I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman modifying the amendment by striking out the word "post-office"?

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to ask if that includes elevator men, watchmen, and others?

Mr. STAFFORD. If they are in the Postal Service; it would include all classes of post-office employees in the Postal Service.

Mr. FARR. As they should be.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a provision in the nature of a further increase of compensation to those employed in the Postal Service. The second provision on page 2 of the rule, where it is proposed to take care of carriers assigned to collection duty, is another illustration of the correctness of the observations that I made a few days ago, to the effect that throughout this Post Office appropriation bill there has been a general tendency to increase the compensation of favored employees in the Postal Service without any proper regard to the interest of the taxpayers, who, in the final analysis, are the ones who must pay the bills this legislation contracts. This amendment is a sweeping provision authorizing the Postmaster General to pay $2,000 to the legal representatives of anyone employed in the Postal Service who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as a result of such injury. Under existing law the payment of this sum of $2,000 in case of death or injury resulting in death within one year from the time of the injury is limited to the following employees in the Postal Service: Railway postal clerks, substitute railway postal clerks, supervisory officials of the Railway Mail Service, rural letter carriers, postal clerks, and special-delivery messengers. This, in effect, gives a $2,000 policy of insurance against death by injury while on duty to every employee in the Postal Service. This, in my judgment, is going altogether too far in favoring postal employees unless it is to be the clearly defined policy of this Government to give this insurance to every employee in every other department of the Government service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman has no objection to giving this provision to the poorly paid laborers, who are more generally engaged in hazardous employment than any other of the enumerated class here except the railway mail clerks? We are now seeking to cover everyone connected with the Postal Service within the purview of the law, and now I wish to ask whether he does not believe this much-deserving class of laborers should be included in that law?

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman in reply to that that I am opposed to this principle of providing indemnity of this character for those in the Postal Service unless it is provided for those in all departments and bureaus of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree we ought to have it for all employees in the Government service, but we have got a proposition before the House now as to whether we want to keep out this one class of employees in the Postal Service who are the most deserving of being included.

Mr. NORTON. Well, I will say to the gentleman, as far as that is concerned, I am greatly more in favor of providing increases of salaries here and special provisions for indemnity in case of death from injury to laborers, who to-day receive in the Government service the lowest salaries, than I am in providing for higher salaries and more special privileges for those in the Postal Service, whom I believe under existing law are being well paid for their services.

As a general proposition I am opposed to legislation for the Postal Service which gives to those in that service a greater salary and more favorable conditions by far than are received by the average man employed in like occupations outside the Government service. I realize, I will say to the gentleman, that we can not equalize social and labor conditions in this country at once or soon. But I do believe that we should keep in mind in enacting legislation of this kind and enacting provisions in this bill, such as are provided for on the next page of this rule, where there is an increase of salaries provided for certain city carriers assigned to collection duty, that there are millions of laborers on the farms, in the fields and factories of this country, who are contributing in large part to pay the taxes that must be had to meet these increased salaries, and that these laborers are receiving a great deal less compensation for their hours of labor than those in the Postal Service are receiving to-day under existing law. I do not believe that the increase in compensation we are providing for certain employees in the Postal Service can be successfully defended, if there is taken into consideration at all the compensation being paid to other employees in the service and being paid to laborers in like occupations outside the Postal Service.

Mr. FARR. Do not most of those people come under the State compensation laws? Why should the gentleman want to discriminate against laborers employed in the service of the Government?

Mr. NORTON. No; I do not believe they do, I will say to the gentleman.

We have a provision in this bill that the maximum to be paid to those who as carriers distribute or collect the mail in cities shall be $1,200 a year, the minimum salary being $800 a year. Under existing law the man who labors for the Post Office Department out in the country as a rural carrier is limited to a salary of $1,200 a year for the standard route. Now, the rural carrier for his $1,200 a year is required to furnish equipment to the value of four to six or eight hundred dollars, in addition to his personal service. For the care and upkeep of wagons and horses or an automobile, if he uses one, out of his salary of $1,200 he must pay three or four hundred dollars each year. Here in the Postal Service is an inequality in compensation that I desire to protest against and that should be borne in mind and carefully considered by every Member of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to withdraw my request for unanimous consent to change the amendment, and ask unanimous consent that instead of it being inserted after the word "employee" that it be inserted before the word "or," so that the paragraph will read:

Special-delivery messenger, post-office laborer, or any other classified civil-service employee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withdraws his former request to modify his amendment by striking out the word "post-office."

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I wish to have "post-office" remain in.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws that request to modify the amendment and asks permission to insert before the word "or," in line 24 of the bill, the words "post-office laborer." Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The next two or three words after that are "or any other classified civil-service employee." As I understand it, a post-office laborer is not called a classified civil-service employee?

Mr. STAFFORD. Neither is a special-delivery messenger.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then should not the word "other" come out, too?

Mr. STAFFORD. That may require amendment, but certainly it does not require that change so far as this proposition is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment at the place indicated in the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] a few moments ago, with reference to my objection that the rural free delivery was not sufficiently protected in this bill, stated my position—entirely without intention, I know—but wholly incorrectly.

I simply desired at that time to say, and because not permitted because of lack of time to make a reply at that time, I now state that my objection to this Post Office appropriation bill, so far as the rural free delivery is concerned, and which I desire to express at that time, is, that at the time of the consideration of this legislation we find, as the patrons of the rural routes know, whether we understand it or not, the fact that the rural free delivery in the United States is absolutely demoralized.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not deny that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I am not taking any captious exception to anything you said. I merely want to make my position clear.

Mr. MADDEN. I want my colleague to distinctly understand that I agree with him on that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I take no exception at all. The gentleman has been manifestly fair, and I have nothing but the highest regard and admiration for him, and so what I say is not in an unfriendly spirit.

The Rural Free Delivery System in this country has been absolutely demoralized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I object to the discussion of this Rural Free Delivery matter.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. You think it would be better to have a quorum?

Mr. MOON. The statement that it is absolutely demoralized is thoroughly incorrect.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does the gentleman suggest it is not absolutely demoralized?

Mr. MOON. It is not demoralized in general. Some particular route may be.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Upon that we take a sharp issue, and those questions can not be settled in this House, no matter how great gentlemen may think they are, but we will go to the people upon that proposition in November and there can be no doubt as to the verdict.

Mr. MOON. We can not settle those matters on this pending amendment, and the gentleman ought to know that.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I understand that.

Mr. MOON. Then let us go along with this amendment.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I might possibly call for a quorum.

Mr. MOON. You might do that. You could do anything you chose. I suggest it is better to get along.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Continuing further, my information is, when they seek to legislate generally upon post-office matters they do not include legislation that will meet the condition of which we complain and be of benefit to the patrons of the rural free delivery. And the rule which has been arbitrarily adopted will absolutely preclude doing that. That is the basis of my opposition with reference to the unfair treatment of the rural routes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the item proposed by the rule as amended by the——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment in the same line, if I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move to strike out, in line 24, after the word "any," the word "other." I understand it is agreed to by the chairman of the committee and gentlemen on the other side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 24, strike out the word "any."

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, no; strike out the word "other," after the word "any."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that amendment. I think it will read better.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 24, strike out the word "other," after the word "any."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the item as amended by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the item as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 4, line 16, after the word "additional."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 16, after the word "additional," insert "That the Postmaster General shall have full authority to grant to any employee not to exceed two weeks' sick leave in any one year with pay, and not approve or continue any rule or regulation automatically terminating the employment of any such laborer by reason of absence when ill for a fixed number of days."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. How does that amendment come before the committee? This paragraph was read more than a week ago and passed upon by the committee.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is quite correct, of course; but my contention in connection with this amendment, which is an amendment which I desired to offer if the previous question had not been adopted and the rule had not been rejected, as it was—my contention is that the paragraph having now been changed by the adoption of the amendment, and being a legislative paragraph, differing from existing law, the entire paragraph is open for amendment.

This paragraph differs from existing law, and I will point out why and where. It does not differ accidentally at all. The existing law reads, on lines 9 to 22, as it is in the bill. Then, if read properly and grammatically, it would be "letter carrier, post-office clerk, or special-delivery messenger." When this committee made up its amendment to the bill, whoever drafted the amendment properly and grammatically dropped out the "or" before "special-delivery messenger" and inserted it where it appears at the beginning of line 24. That constitutes a change. I will call the attention of the Chair to the Manual, where, following the ruling of Speaker James J. Blaine and a long line of distinguished Chairmen, it is held that the change of a single word makes a different proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from New York claim that we can return to this paragraph now for any purpose other than the one prescribed in the rule?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, "the gentleman from New York" claims, having returned to the paragraph, having adopted it and changed it, it is open to amendment, being a proposition on an appropriation bill in violation of Rule XXI.

Mr. MANN. We first want to ascertain if we can get back to it or not.

Mr. BENNET. We are here.

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

Mr. BENNET. We are back to the paragraph, and an amendment has been offered and adopted in relation to the paragraph, changing the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it is just like going back by unanimous consent for the purpose of offering an amendment to a paragraph. We passed the paragraph more than a week ago.

It was not in order to return to it. It is not in order now to return to it. The committee would not be authorized to return to it, and the House by a special rule provides that we shall return to it for a specific purpose. That is all we can do.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order on the amendment. The Chair understands that we returned to this paragraph for the express purpose stated in the rule and for no other purpose. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read the next item affected by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 23, after the word "Service," insert:
"Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National, State, and local holidays that are observed by other branches of the Federal Government."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this provision goes a good ways when it provides that we shall observe, so far as pay is concerned, all local holidays. If the mayor of a city wants to proclaim a holiday, as has been frequently done in Chicago, not for the purpose of stopping business—because the banks do not close; the business houses do not close—but it is called a "holiday" for some special purpose, under this provision you would either close the post office or pay extra time for it.

Now, I do not think the post-office employees are demanding that sort of thing. If they are, they are entirely unjust in their demands. If we provide for National and State holidays, we are doing considerable there; but to say that the mayor of a town can close the post office or require the Government of the United States to pay extra for the keeping open of the post office, when all the banks and all the business houses remain open as usual, seems to me utterly absurd.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Saturday afternoon is declared a holiday.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] to answer that question. I may not perhaps be in full accord with the gentleman on this question myself, but I would prefer that he make answer.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, this provision merely conforms to the regulation that is allowed to all other Federal employees of the Government. It is not asking to give letter carriers and clerks anything other than is now being allowed to other departments of the Federal Government. If it is a local holiday and the other members in the employ of the Federal Government are not allowed that day, these post-office employees are not allowed that day, either.

Mr. MANN. There is no one else who can determine what particular branch of the Federal Government have been granted a holiday on that day until the day has all gone by. Supposing that all did but one. That language is not conclusive. It does not mean anything. No one could observe that language. Under the first provision you could grant a holiday on a National and State holiday, whereas as to local holidays no one knows what it means, and no one can tell what holidays are observed by other branches of the Federal Government. Does that mean all the other branches of the Federal Government? No one will ever know what it means. We ought to define it so they will know. If you want to say "National and State holidays," that would seem to be sufficient.

Mr. TAGUE. I will ask the gentleman what he would suggest?

Mr. MANN. I would say—

For the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National and State holidays—

And stop there.

Mr. TAGUE. Does not the gentleman think that where a city has set aside one special day in the year when all business closes down that should also be included? For instance, in my city of Boston June 17 is celebrated as a holiday. All the departments of the government close down and business in general closes down. Every branch of the service has a holiday that day except the Postal Service. Does not the gentleman think it should apply in instances of that kind?

Mr. WHEELER. I will ask the gentleman a question. Under the rules of the Post Office Department, where business houses are closed by order of the mayor, they have one city delivery that day, and the office remains open until 10 o'clock. In other words, the clerks work two or three hours and the carriers possibly about four hours, but they receive a full day's pay.

Mr. MANN. The Post Office Department has the power now to do that where there is reason for it, and it is not an infrequent thing.

Mr. TAGUE. I have no objection to striking out the word "local."

Mr. MANN. I move to amend the paragraph so that it will read:

Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National and State holidays.

Mr. TAGUE. I will accept that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, lines 2, 3, and 4, so that the paragraph will read:
"Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National and State holidays."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment went in at the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE]. I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois and agreed to by my friend from Massachusetts is probably better than the language of the bill, and I hope it may be agreed to.

Mr. COX. Let us have the amendment reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the rule as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I have not been able to go through this bill carefully enough to know just what the application of this particular provision would be. It says—

For the purpose of this act, holidays shall be, etc.

In what places in this act is reference made to holidays, to which this amendment will apply?

Mr. MOON. Page 12, line 23.

Mr. COX. And on page 12, line 18, also.

Mr. FINLEY. Has the gentleman a copy of the rule?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have a copy of the rule.

Mr. COX. You will not find it in the rule. You will find it in the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does this provision have any application whatever to rural carriers?

Mr. MOON. That is a question for construction by the gentleman himself. I presume that the rural carriers might come under it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wanted to know what construction the gentleman from Tennessee put upon it.

Mr. COX. It applies to clerks in first and second class post offices.

Mr. MOON. It says:

That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be all National and State holidays.

I take it that refers to all postal employees.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not have any idea it applied to rural carriers. That was what I wanted to find out from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to lose 1 day in 30 for deliveries in the country? There is nobody else to take the place of these carriers. If the gentleman wants that, I am sure we in the cities will not object to it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from Illinois will have a little patience he will find out what I want.

Mr. MANN. I have a great deal of patience, but I never have to exercise it with the gentleman from Iowa. His actions do not depend on my patience at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the provision as amended by the amendment which has been agreed to, as follows:

And that no rural carrier shall be compelled to render service upon Christmas Day.

I offer that after the word "holidays" in the amendment which has been agreed to.

Mr. MOON. I make the point of order on that proposition. I will say I have no objection to that being made the law, that they shall not perform service on Christmas Day, but I do not think it ought to be put in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "holidays" insert "and that no rural carrier shall be compelled to perform service on Christmas Day."

Mr. MOON. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman kindly to reserve his point of order.

Mr. MOON. For how long?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only got about two minutes more, I suppose.

Mr. MOON. Go ahead. I will reserve it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me quite clear that such should be the law, and I have heretofore introduced a bill, which has been presented to the Post Office Committee, providing that rural carriers should not be compelled to serve on Christmas Day. I do not believe the country people, as a rule, particularly care about service on Christmas Day; and as that is the only holiday that the rural carriers would get, the only time when they would not be compelled to perform service, it seems to me there is every reason why they should be excused from performing service on that day. But under the regulations of the Post Office Department they are compelled to render the same service upon Christmas Day as on any other day, and they practically get no Christmas. It seems to me the amendment is but just.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It has been a long time since I have had the pleasure of living in the country, but in the city the Christmas morning delivery of mail is about the most important mail delivery in the whole year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is quite different in the country from in the city. I am sorry the gentleman has not lived in the country for so long.

Mr. MANN. Oh, bushels, and tons and tons of mail matter come on Christmas Day all over the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make the point of order?

Mr. MOON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I realize that this is not in order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the item as proposed by the rule as amended by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment as proposed by the rule was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, beginning with the word "Provided," line 7, to and including line 14, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary made between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and letter carriers assigned to delivery duty: And provided further, That letter carriers whose salaries have been reduced as the result of any order of the Post Office Department, making the maximum salary $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to collection duty, shall be restored to their former grades."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the proviso proposed by the rule.

The question was taken, and the proviso was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next item proposed by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is applicable to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (ch. 370, 29 Stat. L., p. 262), and June 26, 1906 (ch. 3546, 34 Stat. L., p. 477).

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We have passed by that paragraph which pertained to surety companies, and, with the indulgence of the committee, I should like to say a word about section 2, as it was proposed. I am not surprised that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads took that paragraph out of consideration at this time. I am very glad that it did. I think it was proper that this matter, if it is to be considered at all, should come before the House in the regular way. It is a great big, broad question, involving Government ownership and control, and the possible dissolution of existing companies organized for the purpose of doing business in a legitimate way. There is a wide difference of opinion as to the service individual surety companies are doing for the Government, but there is also a very good reason to believe that the Government itself could not do any better, and, reading section 2, which I think the committee wisely left out—and if the agitation of the last two days contributed in anyway to having it left out, I am very glad that I had a share in that agitation—I say it was wise to leave it out because the amendment is in very bad form, and would unquestionably have led to a great deal of confusion, showing the danger of attempting an important permanent piece of legislation like this on an appropriation bill. For instance, the Postmaster General was given authority by this section, which happily has been stricken out at least for this session of Congress, to deduct from the salaries of the letter carriers and post-office clerks an amount not in excess of 75 per cent of what they now pay for their surety bonds, which I am informed, so far as the private companies are concerned, are had at the rate of 50 cents per thousand per year, which is a very small sum.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is $1 a thousand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is a dollar a thousand, it still would be a small sum, but I have been informed that it is 50 cents. But I desire to call attention to the phraseology of the paragraph, and if I overstep the five minutes I shall ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes to further explain it. The Postmaster General is authorized to make this deduction for the purpose of creating a fund—going into a private business, as it were——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why the discussion of that paragraph that is not in the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said in the beginning that we had passed the place where this proposed section would have been considered, and I wanted to explain why I thought the committee was wise in leaving the section out.

Mr. MOON. It does not make any difference what the reason is; it is out, and we need not bother with it any more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It rather proves that the opposition to the section was correct.

Mr. MOON. It does not. It does not prove anything of the kind. If the gentleman wants to know why it was left out, I do not mind saying frankly what my reason for it was and, I think, what the reason of the committee was. We have no objection to this section. We think it is a splendid section, and ought to be the law, but in the management of a bill you have got to take into consideration all of the conditions. I did not want too close a vote in this House on all of these amendments. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suspected that, and as I look into the smiling faces of the Maryland delegation, I am sure it is true.

Mr. MOON. I could save 25 or 30 votes by leaving that proposition out, and I want to assure the gentleman that if we are all living next winter we will give him the full benefit of that proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suspected that also, and I am glad the gentleman from Tennessee has given ample notice that this question is to come up again. For that reason, I ask his indulgence and that of the committee for a few moments while I explain why this section 2 should not have gone in the bill in its present form, and why, if it had gone in as a rider and not as original legislation in the regular way, it would have led to great confusion.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to make a suggestion for the regular order, but the gentleman surely ought to know that it is not proper to discuss something that is not before the House and can not be before the House. If a little later on——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOON. If a little later on opportunity should afford, I should not object to the gentleman having 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will agree that I may have five minutes now, I shall not ask for any more on this subject. I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the only difficulty is that if we open up a discussion of that there are some of us who believe that the proposition should become a law who will want a chance to reply to what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose I read to the gentleman a sample provision like this:

From each contractor with the United States of America through the Post Office Department who are now or hereafter may be—

And so forth.

That involves a grammatical construction for which I am sure the committee would not stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree that in a great many bills some grammatical mistakes may be made, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the guarantee fund provided is to be made up from deductions from the salaries of employees of the Postal Service and also from contractors, and that the funds are to be mingled under this provision.

Mr. FOSTER. Unless we are going into it, I do not care to discuss the question further.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to know that he ought not to take up the discussion of this question now. If there is any mistake in that section, it is well cured by being thrown out, and what is the use of talking about it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I congratulate the gentleman and the committee on the fact that the section has been thrown out, and I thank the gentleman for the information that it will come back again next year.

Mr. MOON. Of course it will come back, because it is right.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege of extending my remarks on the bonding question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. My views are entirely in accord with those expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I, too, was opposed to the resolution in its original shape, but after it had been changed and amended by the committee I cheerfully voted for it.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the provision in this bill for a Government bonding fund, first, because I do not believe that the Government should embark in the bonding business. This should be left to private capital and private enterprises. The tendency in some quarters for the Government to undertake things that ought to be left to the States and to the individuals is as wrong and dangerous as it seems to be strong.

This measure will, if it becomes a law, put the Government in the bonding business, will make it a vendor of bonds; and if bonds, why not something else? Why not everything else? Why not sell the postal employees their uniforms? One of these propositions is about as logical as the other. It will unquestionably take a large force of clerks and inspectors to look after this branch of the Post Office Department if it is established by law. There is no provision in the bill for additional employees to do this. I understand the contention is that the present clerks and inspectors can do all this in addition to their present duties. I fear this will not prove true in practice. It is evident, as has already been pointed out by others, that the Government security will never be greater than the amount of the fund, and that the department will have no security until all assessments are paid in, and the whole fund is likely to be wiped out by a single large defalcation. This proposed venture is fraught with much risk.

The Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland paid in net losses on screen-wagon service alone from 1902 to 1907 nearly $300,000. The net loss to this company on the contract of a certain William M. Wiegel for screen-wagon service in New York City was over $200,000. The premium paid by Wiegel was about $2,500.

Where would the Government have gotten the money to meet a loss like this? Not from premiums on star-route or screen-wagon contracts.

In recent years this same company has paid nearly $80,000 on account of losses on bonds of postmasters, letter carriers, and post-office clerks.

Is it not proper, is it not safe business for these companies to investigate cost of service before executing a bond. I would not care to deal with a company that did not do this.

It is proper for them to ascertain as far as they can that the bids for service are adequate and the contractors can perform work given to them without loss.

Companies engaged in the bonding business had their inception in Baltimore, which is the leading surety center. We have there three of the largest and best-managed companies of the kind in the United States. Their business is conducted on a high plane. They give employment to over 1,600 people in their main offices alone, and pay out in salaries over $1,250,000. These companies are not owned by a few men; they have over 2,300 stockholders. Their agents and attorneys throughout the United States number about 24,000. They are managed by men of the highest character—men whose business ability, standing, and integrity are unquestioned.

And it is a privilege for me to have this opportunity to pay this tribute to such men as former Gov. Warfield, Mr. John R. Bland, and Mr. John T. Stone.

Gov. Warfield is president of the Fidelity & Deposit Co. He was governor of Maryland from 1903 to 1907, and he gave our State an able, clean, effective, and progressive administration.

Mr. Bland, who is president of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., is a leading financier and business man, and so is Mr. John T. Stone, president of the Maryland Casualty Co.

These gentlemen are classed, and properly so, among the leading citizens of Maryland. This is the fourth time in four years that a bonding proposition has been presented to Congress. In the former bills it was limited to cover employees only, but now it proposes to include contractors who carry the mails and furnish supplies to the department.

The probabilities of losses in this newly proposed feature are beyond calculation. I have already pointed out to you a loss of over $200,000 to one company on one contract of this kind.

I take no stock in the provision that any employee may give bond with surety or sureties approved by the Postmaster General in lieu of and in place of any assessment for or contributed to the guaranty fund. This would prove optional in name only and not in fact.

Every Government employee would feel bound to patronize the Government bureau for selling bonds. He would not feel free to go to a bonding company. He would feel afraid of incurring the enmity of those favoring this proposition, even though he had not the slightest reason for so fearing.

I am also opposed to this bonding provision because I do not believe in passing new legislation this way. An entirely new proposition like this ought to be treated separately and should stand or fall on its own merits. Let the bonding companies take care of this work as they have been doing. Keep the Government out of the insurance business. The present system is the best for the employee; it is best for the Government. Let it alone.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Was the gentleman's amendment to strike out the last word withdrawn? I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in order to facilitate business, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is going to discuss the proposition, I shall object to it. If he is going to enter into a discussion of it, I might desire to say something in favor of it. If the gentleman desires to extend his remarks, I have no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think a discussion of this question will clear up the atmosphere and relieve the situation next year.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, if we have this discussion here without anything before us, I want to say I do not want to fill up the RECORD with a lot of matter about this proposition until there is an opportunity for somebody to answer it, and I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman get leave to print.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to get leave to print, if I can get an opportunity, but it seems like the chairman of this committee is opposed to any discussion of this question.

Mr. MOON. I am not at all opposed to the discussion of the question, but it is not before the House. That is the point.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The chairman makes the threat that the committee merely struck out this in order to pass this rule, and at the next session he proposes to bring it in again. Now, the question I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania is whether this was not a sufficiently great question that we ought to have a separate bill upon this proposition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course it is; we would all agree on that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And I want to know whether——

Mr. MOON. I will say the gentleman may get a separate bill before the next session, but I do not think so.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We have no objection to a separate bill and a careful discussion of the question upon the floor, so that there will be an opportunity to refute the insinuations that these companies are in a conspiracy to defraud this Government, which have been made on this floor several times and absolutely without the slightest foundation.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LINTHICUM. If it comes to a free and fair discussion, we have no objection to a separate bill; but we do object to these insinuations.

Mr. MOON. I think we ought to discuss the matters that are now in the bill——

Mr. LINTHICUM. In order that I may refute the insinuations and remarks made upon the floor in reference to this question I ask leave that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman understands this——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Wait a minute. I want to reserve the right to object, and I want to see if I am correct. I understand the gentleman wishes now to put in the RECORD a printed speech reflecting upon somebody in reference to remarks made upon this question upon the floor and elsewhere? Is that the purpose?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no desire to reflect upon anybody, but I have a strong desire to insert the facts and a substantiation of the fact that there has been no conspiracy to defraud the Government and no wrong done to this Government, but that these companies are among the strongest and best institutions in this country.

Mr. MOON. I did not ask the gentleman to make a speech about it. I do not object, providing the gentleman does not undertake in his speech to reflect upon anyone. He has no right to print a speech which will reflect upon the Members of this House. With that understanding——

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish to say to the chairman of the committee that he knows from my record in this House that I have never attempted to reflect upon any Member, no matter how much he ought to have been reflected upon.

Mr. MOON. But if the gentleman will undertake to advert to things which the gentleman said were false——

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; I do not think I used the word "false." I said things for which there was no foundation.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object. I will trust to the integrity of the gentleman to keep within the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that he will recollect, I am sure, that in the discussion yesterday he did say in reply to a question of mine in regard to surety companies that if I knew how the Government had been "defrauded" I would have a different idea of the subject.

Mr. MOON. I said that some days ago, and I say it now. I have that proof here now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What I want to say is——

Mr. MOON. I shall not object to your printing anything you want to say about it, so that you keep within the rule. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bonding proposition. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. For four years, Mr. Chairman, this proposition for the Government to enter the bonding business has been attempted in this House, and this time it is not only intended to bond the employees of the department but likewise intended to include the contractors who carry the mail and furnish supplies.

The bonding companies of my city of Baltimore and of the whole country are among the finest and most substantial institutions of the land. For years they have been bonding employees and contractors of the Government and those of private business and private corporations. They have built up splendid institutions with large surpluses, employing thousands of men and controlled by officials of the highest character and standing in their various communities.

There has never been the slightest foundation for any such unwarranted legislation. These companies have proceeded to carry on their work with fairness to all and in the interest of the Government and of the individuals and corporations whom they serve. They have not been earning vast profits, as one would assume from the remarks of certain gentlemen on this floor, but have been trying to do a large and increased business at all times. They look upon this proposed legislation as an entering wedge by which the Government, through overzealous legislators, would gradually assume the bonding business of all the departments and thereby injure these corporations and their various stockholders, who are but citizens and individuals of the land, and take from them a business which they have established at vast expense and with untiring energy. I have always looked upon the function of the Government as undertaking to foster private enterprise and not to destroy nor injure it; that the Government is intended to assist matters in the interest of the people and not to injure their business, unless it was so intimately connected with its functions that it became practically a part of them. Its duty is to protect its citizens, their property, and their rights, not injure and destroy them.

I am therefore opposed to the Government entering those lines of enterprise which are and can be conducted by individuals and private corporations, separate and distinct from the National Government. I know that it is necessary in certain instances where the business is closely connected with the Government administration for the Government to establish a bureau and conduct the same in connection with its general business, but in the case of the bonding of postal employees there is no necessity for such legislation, and it would simply launch the Government through the Post Office in the bonding business.

Employees have been bonded for small premiums, the letter carriers of my city paying only 50 cents for a $1,000 bond; the rural letter carriers a small sum. The Government itself could not conduct this business more efficiently nor cheaper for the employees than the individual corporations are conducting it.

The only foundation I can find for this movement is that the First Assistant Postmaster General has said that certain developments in New York indicate that possibly there was either "intentionally or unintentionally" an effective combination on the part of bonding concerns which resulted in the elimination of bidders—page 145, hearing December, 1915. Here he introduced part of a report made by two Post Office inspectors regarding the matter in which a certain agent of a certain New York company was charged with some irregularity, but which has not yet been proven, and upon these statements and because of the alleged irregularity on the part of one agent all the bonding companies of the country are stamped as being in a conspiracy to increase the bids of those desiring contracts.

The fact that some bidder wanted to take a contract for $44,000 which a bonding company did not believe he could perform for less than $64,000 is made the basis for the assertion that the bonding companies were compelling the increase of prices, whereas the real fact is that the bonding company was simply passing upon the question as to whether they would bond a man to perform a contract for a sum which was too little for the work and which he could not possibly have done for the sum mentioned.

There is no evidence of any combination between surety companies for any purpose whatever, except perhaps an agreement for uniformity of rates. There never has been any combination nor anything approaching the same. The surety companies have by law been placed under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury and that official exerts a most rigid inquiry into their affairs by regular examination of the books of the companies, which are always open to examination under the law. I make a proposition to the chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee that he or any other member having a desire to examine into the affairs of the companies of my city will receive from them every facility for a scrutinizing examination. We have built up three large bonding companies in the city of Baltimore, which is practically the birthplace of the bonding business. The investments of the companies are of the best, and every attention is given to the conduct of the business, which is above reproach and is a monument to our people.

We brand it as unfair, unjust, and ungenerous for anybody to insinuate that there is any combination or anything else by which the Government can be defrauded or lose one cent. There is not the slightest substantial testimony for the charge which has been made, and the whole question has become active by reason of reckless statements on the floor of this House, which were heralded throughout the country and believed in by so many, thereby blinding legislators to fair and just consideration.

If the House desires to consider this question upon its merits, if it desires to examine into the affairs of these companies to ascertain whether or not legislation of this kind would be beneficial to the Government, why not introduce a separate bill and go into the whole question, giving fair and full discussion to every matter, judging those charged with irregularities with the same fairness and justice which he would receive in court, and after all facts are ascertained, then let this House determine whether there is any necessity for a bureau of bonding in the Post Office Department. But until our people are treated fairly, until all insinuating remarks are removed, and until the matter is fully discussed in committee and in this House, I shall raise my voice in protest against any such legislation or any such statements which reflect upon the bonding business of my city.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I make a request to print on the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the same subject. Is there objection?

Mr. COADY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York on which side he intends to print remarks?

Mr. BENNET. On the same side as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. COADY. The reason I ask that is that the gentleman was complaining about the action of the Committee on Rules in striking out section 2.

Mr. MOON. I want to say to the gentlemen from New York and Maryland that I want their remarks to show that they are not made in this House.

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman were as familiar with the rules as I thought he was, he will recall it says "extension of remarks."

Mr. MOON. Yes; and it is a fraud on the public, always.

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman that I will comply with his wishes in the fullest regard. I will say that "this is an extension of remarks." How is that?

Mr. MANN. Is there any great substantial difference between inserting remarks in the RECORD which are not made in the House and talking to the House with nobody present, as was the case with the gentleman from Tennessee when he addressed the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. Answering the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that I am sorry he was absent during the speech. I was here. I was one of the six gentlemen who were here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. The gentleman was here when? Reserving the right to object, I want to say this, that whether there are many or few on occasions when I speak in the House is not a question that concerns me. I am discharging my duty from my place in the House, and if the gentlemen whose duty it is to be here are not here, they can account for that to their constituents. But I defy you to find anywhere that I have attempted to put into this RECORD anything that was not said by me in this House, except when the leave was asked and the RECORD showed the facts, and that only two or three times in 19 years.

Mr. BENNET. The same with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How is it possible, without extending in the RECORD, to publish to the country any remarks about this surety business when we have been forbidden to do it in the debate?

Mr. MOON. The bill may never come or it may come. You better wait until it comes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will take the gentleman's word for it that it will come next year.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order, so that we can get along with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bonding proposition. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FOSTER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

I had intended to discuss the question of star routes when that item was reached in the consideration of the bill, but I concluded that the committee had troubles enough and, therefore, much as I desired to discuss that very important matter, I did not inject myself into the debate and have not up to this time taken any part in it.

I notice that the chairman of the committee printed in the RECORD of February 24 a letter from the Postmaster General, in which that official quoted from a letter which he had written me, or, to be entirely accurate, which the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General had written me, quoting certain language I had used in debate relative to star routes, and taking exceptions thereto. His letter was as follows, in part:

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1916, page 2779, you are quoted as follows:

"Why, there have been routes discontinued in my State in the last two or three years that have been running for 10, 20, and 30 years, and no service has been put in operation to fully take the place of the service thus discontinued."

Then said the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General:

In view of the importance of the matter referred to in your statement, it is requested that you advise this office at your earliest convenience as to any routes discontinued in the State of Wyoming that have not been superseded by equally good service and the name of any post office in the State not now receiving adequate mail facilities.

Before I go on further with this letter to the chairman of the committee, I want to say that I have answered the inquiry of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I was very glad of the opportunity he gave me to bring to his attention in a way that I hope will have some effect the condition in regard to the star-route service in my State. I did in that letter, in answer to the inquiry of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, call his attention to a number of routes in my State that were discontinued at the last general letting, some of which had been running upward of 20 years, and where no service whatever had been supplied for a considerable portion of the territory that had for years been supplied by those routes. I also took advantage of the opportunity which the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General gave me to call his attention to a very considerable number of post offices in my State which have no postal facilities whatever, or, having some postal facilities, have not adequate or reasonable facilities.

I called his attention to some six or eight post offices, as I recall, in the State, and I did not name all such offices which have no service whatever, although they are in a country of considerable agricultural population. I called his attention to a very considerable number of offices that have only a weekly service, and to some others where there is a large population to be served that have service only twice a week.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman is going to speak on this latter feature——

Mr. MONDELL. I will suggest to the chairman of the committee that I might have discussed this matter heretofore, but did not care to take up the time of the committee.

Mr. MOON. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MONDELL. I wanted to speak 10 minutes if I could get the time.

Mr. MOON. I hope the gentleman will not attempt to speak so repeatedly on this same subject.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman inserted in the RECORD a letter concerning remarks made by me on the floor. I thought it was not exactly proper for the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General to call me to account for what I said on the floor, but I have no disposition to be captious about that.

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Wyoming be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, continuing his letter to the chairman of the committee, the Postmaster General says that the inference to be drawn from the statement referred to—that is, my statement—is grossly misleading, and he adds:

In order to correct what is undoubtedly a false impression, I inclose a list of star routes in the State of Wyoming having a less frequency of service than six times a week, with the annual cost of each route and the cancellations of the post offices supplied thereon.

Then the Postmaster General proceeds to give a list of postal routes in my State, costing something like $103,000 per annum.

Of course the Postmaster General was not warranted in referring to my statement as being "grossly misleading." My statement was accurate; it was moderate. I might have said very much more and still have been well within the facts. As I stated to the Fourth Assistant in my reply to him, I called his attention to only a few of the routes discontinued where no service or no satisfactory service had been provided. I also called his attention to a number of offices that have no service whatever.

The trouble with the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, as indicated by this letter, seems to be that he thinks that because we have some service in that mountain State therefore we have all the service that we need, require, or are entitled to. Because of the fact that star routes do not pay he insists that we are not entitled to as good service as our people have been receiving in years past.

That is what I complain of—this attitude of mind, this viewpoint of the Post Office Department, that a service must appear to pay on the figures presented to the department, or, forsooth, the service is not to be granted.

We have from the foundation of the Government assumed that American citizens going forth into a new country are entitled to reasonable postal facilities, and up to the time of the present administration of the Post Office Department we have had comparatively little reason for complaint, and there was comparatively little complaint about the service we received whether under Democratic or Republican administrations. Under the present administration of the department they attempt to lay down the rule that unless we can show a large amount of cancellations at a post office which is not receiving mail, unless we can show conclusively by cancellations that the people are contributing largely to the revenues of the Government we are not entitled to service.

I think the gentlemen are conscientious; I am not disposed to be as severe in my criticism as I sometimes feel inclined to be when I am confronted with the conditions under which we are living. I indulge the hope that now that this matter has been thrashed out the point of view of the department may be modified. I think we are getting as good service in Wyoming as the States around us. There has been no disposition on the part of the department to single us out and to discriminate against us or treat us otherwise than as others are treated; but it is a condition that exists wherever star-route service exists in that western country. I do hope that the administration of the Post Office Department will not attempt in the future, as it seems to have done in the past, to endeavor to recoup for losses to the service elsewhere by denying us the service on the frontier to which we are justly entitled under the fixed policy of our Government heretofore to give the pioneer reasonably good mail service.

My letter to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to which I referred, is as follows:

FEBRUARY 24, 1916.

Hon. J. K. PICKETT,
Acting Fourth Assistant Postmaster General,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 16, as follows:

"In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 12, 1916, page 2779, you are quoted as follows: 'Why, there have been routes discontinued in my State in the last two or three years that have been running for 10, 20, or 30 years, and no service has been put in operation to fully take the place of the service thus discontinued.'

"In view of the importance of the matter referred to in your statement, it is requested that you advise this office at your earliest convenience as to any routes discontinued in the State of Wyoming that have not been superseded by equally good service, and the name of any post office in the State not now receiving adequate mail facilities."

I am very glad indeed to have had you call my attention to this matter, as it gives me an opportunity of presenting to you briefly some of the needs of Wyoming in the way of mail facilities. I shall not burden you with a statement of all of the routes that have been discontinued without good service to fully take the place of the service thus discontinued, or of all of the improved facilities needed. That would make too long a letter, but I am glad to avail myself of the opportunity of calling your attention to a few of our needs.

One of the lines discontinued, to which I referred, was the line from Gillette, Wyo., to Graham, Mont. This line, 85 miles in length, was, as I recall it, a twice-a-week service, and it was in operation for many years. At one time it served a Wyoming post office north of Gillette, but later its value, so far as Wyoming was concerned, which was very great, was that of supplying mail to people en route along the valley of Powder River and its tributaries. Quite recently I was informed a weekly service was established through part of the territory formerly served by this line between Gillette and the new office of Weston, 45 miles north, but that service does not appear on the new postal map just received.

Assuming this route has been established and is now running, it is the only service that we have had for a number of years in that great expanse of territory. In the past two years a number of petitions have been sent in asking for service covering one part or another of the region north of Gillette, but so far no favorable action has been taken. This line was maintained at a time when the settlement was sparse, whereas in the past three years the territory has been very largely settled and occupied, so much so that there are now in the region north of Gillette, in Campbell County, besides the office of Weston, which has once a week a service, if it has, the offices of Shorty, Morse, Vere, Recluse, and Soukup, none of which have any service except special service, which is not service at all under conditions existing, except as people supply the offices with mail practically gratuitously.

For many years a daily mail line extended from Lost Cabin to No Wood, in Wyoming, as part of an important through route. At the time of the last reletting no provision was made for service between Lost Cabin and No Wood, a region which was supplied with daily mail for many years, and a region which now has more people to be supplied en route than formerly.

We formerly had daily mail service from Casper, Wyo., by way of Alcova, Split Rock, Hailey, and Dallas, to Lander. This line goes back almost to the days of the old overland trail. There are now two very long gaps in that former route with no service whatever, to wit, between Alcova and Split Rock and between Split Rock and Hailey. There is a continuous line of ranches over considerable portion of the areas which have thus been deprived of all mail facilities. I would not expect a daily service, but no service at all creates a very trying situation. In fact, the only service between Alcova and Dallas, a distance of something like 70 miles, is a twice-a-week service from Rawlins to Split Rock, and a twice-a-week service from Dallas to Hailey. The ranchmen along the Sweetwater, on the old overland trail, who had daily mail for many years, now go from 20 to 40 miles to a post office where they get mail twice a week.

There are a number of similar situations in various parts of the State, but it is hardly worth while to refer to them. What we seek now is better service for the conditions as they exist to-day. We need a service at least twice a week from Gillette north to Shorty or Rockypoint. We need another service northwest to Soukup and Recluse to Vere of twice a week.

The once-a-week line from Gillette to Wright runs through a country which a good part of the way is thickly settled for our country. There we need twice-a-week service.

The service from Casper to Salt Creek should be at least three times a week, in view of the importance of the operations around Salt Creek.

The line from Arminto to Barnum should be increased to three times a week.

The line from Newcastle to Hampshire should be increased to three times a week.

The frequency of the line between Rock Springs, Eden, and Farson should be increased.

Riverton and Lander should both have a daily mail service to Dubois, with a junction in the vicinity of Lenore or Jay Kay.

The line between Horton and Sundance, by way of Inyankara, should be made a three-times-a-week line, as it runs through a thickly settled country.

A line should be established from Alcova to Split Rock to supply the people along the Sweetwater River of at least twice a week.

The people on the line from Rock River to McGill, Garrett, Eagle, and Toltec are entitled to increased service.

These are but a few of the numerous localities in our State where I believe the people are entitled to better service than they are receiving. Had I the time I could call your attention to many other localities where service should be supplied or increased.

It may be said in regard to some of the proposed new lines that the post offices which they are expected to supply have shown but a small amount of business and not enough to warrant a considerable expense for service. I am sure the people in your office who are familiar with conditions understand that no office receives any considerable amount of business, except under very extraordinary conditions, until it has regular service. Furthermore, people have gotten so accustomed to using boxes for the receipt and delivery of mail along star routes that they do but very little of their postal business through the post office. The importance of our star routes depends much more on the service en route than on the service to post offices in many instances.

It may be argued against some of the requests for new service that the terminal offices are now supplied from other directions and do not have sufficient business to warrant the increased supply. Such objection to new service between existing offices again ignores the fact that star routes in our country of great distances have their value largely in the supply of patrons en route.

It no doubt will be further argued that the cost of the new routes and the increased service which I have suggested is high compared with the direct return in cancellation to the department. That is true. It always has been true in regard to star-route service and always will be. In the first place, the outgoing mail delivered en route and to small offices by star route is very much heavier than the mail originating at such offices and on such routes, but the credit for such business goes to the large office where it originates, rather than to the office of destination.

Furthermore, it has been the unvarying policy of the Government to furnish reasonable mail facilities to American citizens wherever located. There is a pretty wide gap between nine-times-a-day delivery, furnished in some cities, and once-a-week service. Our people do not expect extraordinary facilities, but they do expect and are entitled to, under the policy of our Government from the beginning, mail at reasonably frequent intervals.

I never have and I never shall ask the department to establish or to increase service except where, with full knowledge of the situation, I would feel justified in doing it, had I the responsibility which rests upon the officials of the Post Office Department. I have no doubt, as I stated on the floor of the House in the discussion to which you have referred, but what the officials of the department are acting conscientiously, but in the meantime the people whom I have the honor to represent are, many of them, denied adequate mail facilities, and I feel it my duty to continue to urge that these facilities be afforded them. I trust that the cases to which I have referred and other pending before you may be given favorable consideration.

Yours, very truly,

F. W. MONDELL.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair regards the gentleman's amendment as pro forma. Does the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming withdraws his pro forma amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I will say that in that same connection I desire to have placed in the RECORD some communications from the department in reference to similar questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to print the letters to which he refers?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters submitted by Mr. MOON:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 26, 1916.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: I have observed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 25 that Representative SMITH of Minnesota on that date introduced an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill which had for its purpose the amending of section 3928 of the Revised Statutes so as to provide that when a return receipt is furnished upon the request of the sender to show the delivery of any registered mail the place where the same was delivered shall be given.

You will recall that this proposed amendment of the Revised Statutes was under discussion in the House of Representatives during the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1916. I am therefore transmitting herewith a copy of a letter addressed to you by the Postmaster General, under date of December 14, 1914, embodying the objections of the department to any legislation which will require the place of delivery to be shown on return receipts for registered mail. These objections prevail in their entirety at this time.

Yours, very truly,

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

DECEMBER 17, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: It is observed that section 26 of the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, which was introduced into the House of Representatives on December 14, 1914, contemplates an amendment to the act approved May 23, 1910 (ch. 255, 36 Rev. Stats., p. 416), now carried in Postal Laws and Regulations as section 931, so as to provide that when a return receipt is furnished upon the request of the sender to show the delivery of any registered mail, the place where the same was delivered shall be also given.

In this connection I beg to invite your attention to my letter of December 14 last, setting forth reasons why I am opposed to the enactment of any law which would make it mandatory to have shown on return receipts the place of delivery of registered mail other than the post office of delivery. I trust that the provision referred to in the bill will be eliminated, as the benefit which would accrue from the enactment of such a law would be considerably more than offset by the burden inflicted upon all addressees of registered mail for which return receipts are requested, and result in unnecessary additional time and expense by the Post Office Department.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

DECEMBER 14, 1914.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE MOON: Numerous communications have been received by the department from Members of Congress with reference to the request made by the C. F. Adams Co., of Erie, Pa., that the place of delivery of a registered letter be shown on the return receipt furnished the sender thereof. This firm, some time ago, took up the matter with the Third Assistant Postmaster General, and upon being informed that it was inadvisable for the department to comply with its request, had its branch offices, located in various States, communicate with the Senators and Representatives from such States. In the belief that this matter will be brought to the attention of your committee, I am furnishing you with the following informtion which forms the basis of my opposition to the passage by Congress of any provision making it obligatory on the department to have shown on return receipts the point of delivery of registered matter represented thereby.

It has been a long-standing policy of the department, and I believe that the best interests of the public are subserved thereby, not to furnish the senders of any class of mail information as to the street addresses of the recipients of such matter. This policy is reflected in the Postal Laws and Regulations (sec. 523) which provide that "complete or partial lists of names of patrons shall not be furnished by postmasters, post-office employees, or members of their families." On the ground that it would be unfair to furnish information to senders of registered mail not given to senders of ordinary mail, this policy has always been applied with equal force to registered mail.

Cases have arisen where persons or firms engaged in particular lines of business have secured the registration of letters containing articles of little or no value sent solely for the purpose of locating an alleged debtor or obtaining his signature. It has been held by the department that this practice is plainly a misuse of the registry system, which was established for the "greater security of valuable mail matter" (R. S., 3926), and that the use of false pretenses in obtaining from debtors or alleged debtors information as to their present location amounts to fraud, and in several instances where such practices were persisted in fraud orders have been issued.

If street addresses were obtainable in the manner contemplated in this bill, it would doubtless encourage the improper use of the registered mails, and in this way in many instances the registry service would be instrumental in working a deception upon the public and made to serve an improper purpose and not one contemplated by the law providing for its establishment.

The present law with reference to the furnishing of return receipts provides that—

"Whenever the sender shall so request, a return receipt shall be taken on the delivery of any registered mail matter, showing to whom and when the same was delivered, which receipt shall be returned to the sender, and be received in the courts as prima facie evidence of such delivery." (Act of May 23, 1910, R. S., 3928, 36 Stat., 416.)

It will be observed that the law only provides that return receipts shall show to whom and when registered matter is delivered. In addition, however, such receipts are postmarked to show the post office from which delivery is made and the date of delivery. Considerable difficulty is experienced in having the recipient of the registered matter even fill in the date of delivery and when he neglects or refuses to do this, it must be done by the delivering postal employee, requiring the expenditure of additional time. If it is required that the street and number at which the addressee is located be added, it is believed that further complications would arise, as many addressees would object to this information being placed on return receipts; and more time, both on the part of the public and the delivering postal employee, would be consumed, either on account of the failure of the recipient to add the street and number, making it necessary for the delivering postal employee to do so, or because of the latter being required to wait while the person receiving the registered matter added the street and number. This would retard materially the delivery of ordinary as well as registered mail, especially by letter carriers, whose time is limited because of the amount of work to be performed within a given period and would undoubtedly necessitate additional carriers in many of the larger cities. In the majority of instances the sender is probably in possession of information as to the street and number of his correspondent, and the advantages which would accrue from the enactment of the proposed law to the few senders of registered mail who desire this information would be considerably more than offset by the burden inflicted upon all addressees of registered mail for which return receipts are requested, without even considering the additional time and expense unnecessarily expended by the Post Office Department.

It is believed that no change should be made in the existing law, especially in view of the fact that there appears to be but little demand for this added service; in fact, the only request of this character which has reached the department in recent years is from the concern mentioned in the first paragraph of this communication. If such information is furnished with reference to the thirty-odd million of pieces of registered mail delivered, we would undoubtedly be called upon to furnish it on the return receipts showing the delivery of insured parcel-post or fourth-class mail. It is estimated that the service is handling from twenty to twenty-five million insured pieces at the present time, and the number is steadily on the increase.

For the above reasons I deprecate the enactment of any law which would make it mandatory upon the department to have shown on return receipts the place of delivery of registered mail other than the post office of delivery.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 24, 1916.

Hon. FINLY H. GRAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GRAY: I note in your remarks on page 3136 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as of February 17, you state your position relative to the readjustment of the Rural Delivery Service in Wayne County, Ind., and the introduction of motor vehicles therein. I fail to notice, however, that you have included the declaration "that you know that 140 additional families who were denied all mail facilities are now supplied through this revision of service, and that you advocated a return to the former service, regardless of the inconvenience that these 140 additional families might be subjected to."

Will you kindly make this correction in the RECORD so that there may be no misunderstanding of your position and in order that the people of Wayne County, Ind., may be fully informed of the value of the revision to them.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 24, 1916.

Hon. CHAS. F. REAVIS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. REAVIS: I note in your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, dated February 17, page 3138, you say:

"When you go to the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and tell him of the value that Rural Mail Service is to the Government * * * the only reply you get from him is, 'I am not interested in the inconveniences of John Jones or John Smith out in Nebraska; I am trying to effect economy.'"

As I believe you are willing to correct any misstatements or any declarations that may be misleading, please make such correction in the RECORD at this time, since you received no such statement from me or from anyone connected with this bureau. Neither has any Representative in Congress, postmaster, or postal patron been told that the recent revision of the rural service was undertaken solely for reasons of economy.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

FEBRUARY 24, 1916.

Hon. S. D. FESS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FESS: I note in your remarks as set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 22, page 3416, with reference to increasing the Rural Delivery Service, you say:

"Here is a step—the first of its kind—to lessen it, and it is put on the basis of economy."

As I believe that you will quickly correct any declarations attributed to you that are either misstatements of facts or misleading in intent, I trust you will do so in this instance.

If you remember, you stated to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that you had appeared at this bureau and attempted to interview the superintendent of rural mails and that you had been denied an audience, whereupon you were told that it would be advisable to call upon the head of the bureau, which you did. I believe you were shown every possible courtesy and consideration.

In the presence of Mr. G. L. Wood, superintendent of the division of rural mails, and within the hearing of other employees every proposed plan of the bureau for the extension of rural delivery in your district was exhibited to you. Every hope and desire of the department was explained to you and you were assured that nothing would be done in your district, or in any other locality in Ohio, that would be prejudicial to the postal patrons. Also that before any service was introduced a representative of this bureau would visit the territory where the readjustment was proposed, interview any interested individuals, illustrate to them the desirable features of the proposed readjustment, and accept from them any statements derogatory to the same, such representative to be authorized to make any adjustments, corrections, or alterations that would be agreeable.

This was the first and only instance when you called at this office, and at no time during your visit was the question of economy discussed in any manner. I earnestly endeavored to indicate to you how the department had provided mail facilities for thousands of additional families through this revision and the introduction of a modern motor vehicle in this field of postal activity and how difficult it had been to introduce this device in the face of opposition based largely upon the possibility that some individual might thereby lose a public place.

To all of this you apparently agreed, stating that if this was the course the department intended to pursue you cared nothing for the interests of individuals involved, but desired the best possible service for the postal patrons, and left this office seemingly well pleased.

Under those conditions I would respectfully request that you make a correction in the RECORD, as herein indicated.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 25, 1916.

HON. JOHN A. MOON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: During recent discussions of the Postal Service on the floor of the House certain misleading and incorrect statements in regard to the revision of the Rural Delivery Service were made. For your information, I am therefore sending you copies of letters which I have this day addressed to Representatives FESS, REAVIS, and GRAY on this particular subject.

Yours, very truly,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 25, 1916.

HON. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Committee on Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOON: The letter of the 21st instant to Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, House of Representatives, which was made in reply to unwarranted statements of the Congressman in regard to the revision of the Rural Delivery Service in his district, especially in Hennepin County, Minn., has brought forth a further extension of his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 23d instant. While making no attempt to controvert the facts set out in the letter, he inserts various criticisms of the department concerning the revision from newspapers and patrons of the service residing in his district.

The evidence presented to the department that this revision on the whole is in the interest of the entire patronage of the service is so overwhelming and so conclusive that no attempt need be made to evade any responsibility in the matter. The department is in receipt of very many letters commending its action from every standpoint in this revision, and these come from patrons who are grateful for an extension of the service whereby they are furnished with mail facilities not heretofore given them, and these patrons vastly outnumber the very few who are slightly incommoded

The Post Office Department is not only charged with the administration of the postal business, but is honestly endeavoring to give the people every convenience and facility warranted from a postal standpoint, and tactics that give color to any other motive must be considered as an attempt to misrepresent the facts. It has been the practice of the department always to cooperate with Members of Congress in this purpose, but the Congressman in this case has seen fit to withhold these protests and have them inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in support of his attack on the department, instead of forwarding them to the department, where action would have been taken promptly to effect such readjustment as might be necessary to grant any reasonable request for a change. While such cases are isolated ones, they serve to accentuate the trifles that produce criticism of a systematic and comprehensive revision that has benefited and improved the entire service. No attempt is herein made to explain the motive underlying this proceeding, but if the Post Office Department is to further the interests of the rural delivery, after being condemned on such meager and ex parte evidence through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it is inconceivable how satisfactory results can be obtained in the operation of the service, especially if no relief can be had from what the Congressman insinuates is an intolerable condition and a "disastrous muddle" except by public reprimand and censure in a coordinate branch of the public service. Moreover, it is not understood how anyone cognizant of the facts could encourage any action that would indicate even in the remotest degree that the department is attempting to injure the service or that it be made the subject of ridicule because of a few trifling irregularities which are being corrected as rapidly as the small force of inspectors at hand can accomplish it. The department is endeavoring to present this matter strictly on its merits, but it should not be subjected to censure by any action which has for its object the presentation of infinitesimal parts of the subject without mentioning the larger and more comprehensive benefits obtained, and which means the extension of the maximum of good service at the least expense to practically every patron affected by the revision.

It is desired that this letter be given such prominence as you may deem advisable in the matter.

Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of section 7 as proposed by the rule.

The section was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next item proposed by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That so much of section 1 of the "act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of section 8.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this section ought to be agreed to. It illustrates, however, very graphically the result of these legislative provisions in appropriation bills. Only three years ago the same committee, largely composed of the same Members, put into a Post Office appropriation law a provision which they said was of great importance at that time. Now they repeal it.

Mr. STEENERSON. My recollection is that that was put on in the Senate; it originated in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Well, it originated, then, in the Post Office Committee of the Senate, and was agreed to by the Post Office Committee of the House. It could not get into the law unless the conferees had agreed to it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that that is a Senate provision that was inserted.

Mr. MANN. What difference does it make whether it is a Senate provision or a House provision? It could not have gotten into the law if it had not been agreed to by the House or the House conferees. I am not saying they did wrong in agreeing to it. There are several more of these propositions that are now before us by the rule, or which were in the bill, which are to change laws passed only a few years ago, that came out of the Post Office Committee. It is because of the carelessness in reference to legislation ordinarily accompanying riders on appropriation bills and is not chargeable to special carelessness on the part of the Post Office Committee. It is true that these provisions in connection with the appropriation bills do not receive the same careful scrutiny of Congress, the House or the Senate, or even the committees, that individual bills do. Therefore we enact one year a legislative provision on an appropriation bill, and then the next year or the year thereafter we enact another provision repealing it or amending it; possibly doing right the second time, it may be striving for the right the first time, but not doing it very well.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the House conferees found themselves in such a position that they could not very well do otherwise than agree to it, or kill the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, pshaw, Mr. Speaker, that is all buncombe! I know how conferees conduct their conferences and deal with a bill, and when the House conferees say that they had to yield on a legislative provision inserted by the Senate or kill the bill, everyone who knows anything about parliamentary procedure knows that that is not correct; because the universal rule is that the body which proposes a legislative provision to which the other House will not agree must in the end recede, and they always do recede.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Last year the House conferees did stand for the bill, and the bill died.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the bill died because the chairman of the committee lost it, did not have it in the House. The House conferees agreed last year, the Senate conferees agreed; the conference committee came to an agreement; but when it came to act upon it, nobody could find the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of section 8 proposed by the rule.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (ch. 1759, 33 Stat. L., p. 440), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails without postage stamps affixed quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter mailed at the special rates of 1 cent and 2 cents a copy, and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter, and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the character of third and second class mail that pays the special rate of 1 and 2 cents a copy, as referred to in the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that circulars are included, and as a rule that constitutes the bulk of the mail that goes through under this provision. At present the number mailed at the same time must be not less than 2,000, and it is proposed to reduce that amount below 2,000 because the department state that they find it will be advantageous to the service and will make for greater efficiency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what special class of second-class mail pays at the rate of 2 cents a copy?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman will find it in volume 29 of the Statutes at Large, page 262. That section provides—

That mailable matter of the fourth class shall embrace all matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class which is not in its form or nature liable to destroy, deface, or otherwise damage the contents of the mail bag or harm the person of anyone engaged in the Postal Service, and is not above the weight provided by law, which is hereby declared to be not exceeding 4 pounds for each package thereof, except in case of single books weighing in excess of that amount, and except for books and documents published or circulated by order of Congress, or printed or written official matter emanating from any of the departments of the Government or from the Smithsonian Institution, or which is not declared nonmailable under the provisions of section 3893 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of July 12, 1876, or matter pertaining to lotteries, gift concerns, or fraudulent schemes or devices.

It is generally, as I stated, circulars sent out by advertising houses or for the most part by department stores.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the explanation of the gentlemen so far as third-class matter was concerned, which pays the rate of 1 cent, as to circulars. I am inquiring what is the special character of second-class mail that is charged at the rate of 2 cents a copy?

Mr. FINLEY. I have not the statute before me.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman has not the information, I will not detain the committee. I thought the gentleman had the information.

Mr. FINLEY. It is for the most part confined to circulars and the documents I have mentioned.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment proposes to extend it to second-class mail, and apparently no one knows exactly what character of mail it extends to.

Mr. FINLEY. It is extended to all second-class mail.

Mr. STAFFORD. But second-class mail pays 1 cent a pound, and not 2 cents a copy.

Mr. STEENERSON. If anyone wishes to mail a single copy of a newspaper, he can not send it at pound rates. It is only the publishers who have that privilege.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it has been admitted as second-class matter, enjoying the 1-cent-a-pound rate, it goes at the rate of 1 cent for 4 ounces when single copies are mailed, by anyone other than the publisher. This says 2 cents a copy—but I will not press the inquiry further.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that the amendment makes no change in the classification?

Mr. FINLEY. No change of classification is contemplated that I can see.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. So that it will be the classification that now exists.

Mr. FINLEY. The present classification under existing law.

Mr. FESS. I move to strike out the last two words.

On February 22 I made this observation upon the rural service:

If there is any change it should be to extend the service, not to retard it. Every step that has been taken up to this time has been to increase the service. Here is a step—the first of its kind—to lessen it, and it is put on the basis of economy.

The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has read this statement that he had placed the change on that basis, and I have a letter from him which says:

As I believe that you will quickly correct any declarations attributed to you that are either misstatements of facts or misleading in intent, I trust that you will do so in this instance.

I read the statement that the proposed change was put upon the basis of economy. The Fourth Assistant says that the change is not upon that basis. I do not make the statement that he said so, but I do make the statement that it has been generally considered throughout the country that that is one of the reasons why the proposed change has been made. I am very glad to put into the RECORD this statement that the Fourth Assistant denies that the change is put upon that basis at all, and I make it because I do not want it to appear that in stating what I did I implied that he had put it upon that basis. However, Mr. Chairman, I still think that economy is one of the arguments that is being adduced for this change, and I think that economy should not begin at this point. I believe that it is not only inefficient but that it is bad economy.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments are withdrawn, and the question is on the adoption of section 9 as proposed by the rule.

The question was taken, and section 9 as proposed by the rule was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next item proposed by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of section 11, as proposed by the rule.

The question was taken, and section 11 was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next item proposed by the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from and after the 1st day of July, 1916, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, and closed-pouch service.

Full railway post-office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post-office cars shall be for standard-sized cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Apartment railway post-office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post-office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department, as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment at this point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is this section now being considered by paragraphs or as one section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all these other sections have been considered by sections, and the Chair thinks this ought to be considered in the same way.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I will withhold my amendment until the section is completed.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it will not make any difference either way, but I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will ask unanimous consent to consider it by paragraphs, as this is an important section.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very important section and ought to be considered by paragraphs. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that section 17 shall be considered by paragraphs. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the first three or more paragraphs have already been read.

The CHAIRMAN. No one objected to them.

Mr. RAKER. I understood that the whole section was to be read.

Mr. MADDEN. There will be no objection to going back.

Mr. RAKER. I want to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the entire section.

Mr. MOON. That can be done at the end.

Mr. MANN. We can have an understanding that the gentleman can offer his substitute at the end of the reading of the section.

Mr. RAKER. After the entire section is read paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this proposed section 17 be considered by paragraphs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 15, page 38, strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following:

"Provided, That no parcel-post package shall exceed 50 pounds in weight."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to a point of order. It is entirely in order at this point in the bill, which deals altogether with the use of cars for carrying mail. A limitation on the weight of any package of mail that goes into a car surely ought to be in order in that connection.

Mr. Chairman, the one serious contention that has been made in connection with the consideration of the railway-mail pay is that there might be danger of diverting a large part of the high-class fast freight to the storage car, if the weight of the parcel post should be increased to 100 pounds, and I suggested in my remarks upon the railway-mail pay feature of the bill on the 11th of this month, in which I went very carefully into the problem of carrying the mail by space instead of by weight, that the only possibility of serious danger of diversion might follow an increase in the weight of the parcel from 50 to 100 pounds. There is no disposition on the part of anyone, as I understand it, to do an injustice to the railways. On the contrary, it should be and undoubtedly is, and I believe it is, the intention of every man on the floor to treat the railroad companies of the United States with the utmost fairness. I have no disposition myself to do anything else than to see they are fairly treated, at the same time protecting the rights of all the other people of the United States. I believe that the plan of railway-mail pay based upon space is the most scientific way of moving the mail. I believe the railway companies will be fully compensated for any work they do for the Government under the space plan. I believe they will get $6,000,000 more under the space plan than they are getting now under the weight plan, if we assume that the same number of car-miles of movement will be covered during the coming year that has been covered during the past, and that is, of course, the only basis upon which we can make any calculations. But the time has come when there ought to be a limit placed upon the size of the package that is carried in the parcel post.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Without the gentleman's amendment is there any limit at all as to the weight?

Mr. MADDEN. There will be no limit on the power of the Postmaster General to fix the weight without some such amendment as this.

I submit for the consideration of the committee that there ought not to be placed in anybody's power the right to place an unlimited weight on the parcels that we are to carry by mail. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. MOON. I did not make the point of order; I simply reserved the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I do not desire to consume any further time——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to make the point of order?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. MANN. Let us dispose of that, then.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to explain this fully, that the time has come when we ought not to have any doubt about what the weight of the parcel is to be. The parcel-post law was enacted to facilitate the exchange of the commodities of the people of the country and the people of the cities at the least possible expense, and I do not know of any case where it has been found necessary to send parcels of more than 50 pounds in weight. There have been cases of great injustice done, however, in the Western States, where whole carloads of coal have been shipped in 48-pound packages; whole carloads of ore, carloads of potatoes, carloads of cement, carloads of brick, sand, and all kinds of things put in the 48-pound packages. Now, that never was the intention. It was never intended when the parcel-post law was enacted that any such condition as that would arise.

Mr. STEENERSON. Did not the original parcel-post law provide it should be applicable to the products of the farm and factory?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and it ought to be confined to them. It ought not to be used for the purpose of taking away the freight business from the railroads, and I believe that if we allow an increase in the weight as a matter of fact it will do a great injustice to the railroads, and we want to do them ample justice and no injustice.

With the weight fixed at 50 pounds I stake my reputation, after a careful study of this legislation to which I have given three years of arduous work, that no harm will be done to the railroads; that none of their freight will be diverted to the storage car; that the arguments made by the Merchants' Association of New York and like associations of the United States, and statements made by the railroad officials to the effect that their great fear was that the adoption of the space basis plan would divert freight from their fast freight and from their express to the storage mail car, and the fact that the Government could load a larger amount of matter in a storage car than is now carried would not apply are not justified if we limit the weight to 50 pounds. But I am free to confess that if the weight shall go up to 100 pounds we will have done an injustice to the railroads and we will have done an injustice to the Postal Service, because it will not be possible to continue the Postal Service with its present facilities if we fix a package so large that we have to employ machinery to load and unload it. When the package gets to be so large that a man can no longer handle that package the cost of moving it will become much greater than it is to-day, but if we can maintain the size of the parcels so that a man can lift them and handle them and deliver them there is no reason why the expense in conducting the department should be increased. I submit to the membership of the House and to the country that the Post Office Department was never intended to engage in the freight business. It was intended when we adopted this law to accommodate the people of America, and particularly the people in the rural districts, so that they might be able to exchange the commodities of the farm for the money of the people living in the cities, and that they might be able, to the extent of a reasonable weight, to obtain the commodities of the factory at the lowest possible transportation cost. I believe that if the future should prove the necessity for a greater weight than 50 pounds that it will then be time enough to enact a law authorizing somebody to make the greater weight. Until that necessity arises and until we have developed the parcel post as one of the scientific branches of the Postal Service, until we have proven beyond any question that the interests of the people are best served by a larger weight, I submit that we ought not to increase the weight. Until we have proven that there is need for more weight and until we have been able to show whether we are making money or breaking even under the present method, that method ought not to be changed by increasing the weight above what it is to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in his remarks alluded to the fact that the Merchants' Association of the city which I represent in part arrived at a different conclusion than that which he had himself arrived at as to the justice of this bill. I admit, in the beginning, the very high degree of intelligence the gentleman has and—I say it without any desire to be almost blasphemous—his consecrated devotion to his work in this body, and I compliment him; but it seems to me that the facts that the gentleman so frankly states—that, so far as I can find out, substantially all the railroads in the United States think that they will be injured, as well as associations like the Merchants' Association, with four, five, or six thousand members, and other associations of an independent character—put this House in a position where we ought not to be asked in this summary way, without a report from the committee detailing the reasons for the adoption of this particular amendment, to vote for it.

Mr. MADDEN. We have got reports; we have got everything complete; we have got information beyond limit.

Mr. BENNET. Where is it? I have read the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in connection with House bill 10484, and there is not anything in it. There may be a report somewhere. If the gentleman says there are reports somewhere, there are reports somewhere. I admit that. But that has not been brought to the attention of the House in an orderly way, and the House is absolutely uninformed. It was only day before yesterday that an official of the Pennsylvania Railroad came to me with a list, which he said was correct, showing me that in some instances, if this bill went into effect, it will reduce the rate of pay for carrying the parcel-post mail, under some of the provisions of this long amendment, below what they got for carrying freight—80 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. I admit they contended that before the committee, but I do not admit that they stated the facts.

Mr. BENNET. Now, there we have it, the gentleman, a man of reliability and conviction, on the one side, and the gentlemen, officials of our most prominent railroads, on the other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from New York object to my putting that statement in the RECORD in his time?

Mr. BENNET. What statement?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The statement of the difference in rates.

Mr. BENNET. I am perfectly willing that it should go into my remarks at this place, and I shall ask unanimous consent that it may.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will read my statement in the RECORD, which I made several days ago, he will find I recited every contention that the railroad companies made as to the rates and the difference in rates, and as to what would happen under certain conditions. This amendment here, however, is intended to help.

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman it will not be necessary for me to read his speech, because I sat here and listened to it every minute, and it was a very excellent and admirable speech, but nowhere in that speech did the gentleman make the statement, I think, which is made, that the railroads contended if this provision were adopted rates for carrying mail would be reduced below the rates for carrying freight as much as 80 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what I said, if the gentleman will allow me: I said that the railroad companies contended that it would be possible to carry 20 tons of mail matter on a storage car, whereas we carry only 7½ tons now; that to carry the 20 tons of mail matter on a storage car would reduce the rate to 1¼ cents. The rates now are as high as from 3 to 4 cents per ton-mile. If the gentleman will read the speech, he will learn exactly what I said on the floor.

Mr. BENNET. I heard the gentleman's speech, and I recognize what he says now, apparently, as what he said then. And that illustrates a point. Now, here we are from all vocations in life. I undertake to say that if it were put up to at least 40 per cent of the membership of this House to define a storage car or be executed they would be executed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman contend that we would not be able to define it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request, and will speak on another paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether under the unanimous-consent agreement it is too late to offer an amendment to the first paragraph of this section, but I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that last year when it was up, it reading "from and after the 1st day of July," we changed it so that it would read "from and after the 30th day of June."

Mr. MOON. From what section are you reading?

Mr. MANN. Page 37, line 6. Last year, I say, we changed it so that it would end with the quarter. By changing it so that it would read "from and after the 30th day of June"——

Mr. MOON. I think that is right.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman offer it?

Mr. MOON. I offer an amendment to strike out "the 1st day of July" and insert "30th day of June."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "first" and inserting the word "thirtieth" and strike out the word "July" and insert the word "June."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Closed-pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, in the nature of a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, after line 21, insert:

"Provided, however, That no pay shall be made for any car carrying any letter, postal card, circular, newspaper, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind or containing a solicitation of an order or orders for said liquors, or any of them, in the mails of the United States when addressed or directed to any person, firm, corporation, or association, or other addressee, at any place or point in any State or Territory of the United States at which it is by the law in force in the State or Territory at that time unlawful to sell, barter, exchange, keep for sale, or otherwise dispose of such liquors, or any of them, or at which point or place it is unlawful by the law then in force in the State or Territory to advertise or solicit orders for such liquors, or any of them, respectively."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. BENNET. That is a clear limitation. The Chair ruled yesterday, I think it was, or the day before, in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Florida [CLARK] that a limitation was in order.

Mr. MOON. There is no appropriation right here. There is no limitation.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, yes; there is. It provides that no payment shall be made for any car, because this is the language relating to rates, and—

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely—

And—

Provided, however, No payment shall be made for any car that carries any letters—

And so forth.

This amendment is requested by an act of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, a dry State, which sent a delegation from their legislature to this Congress, and which appeared before the Post Office Committee of this Congress, appealing for this law. But the Post Office Committee has not yet reported. Now, here we are with legislation——

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman that that bill has had a partial hearing before the committee, but the hearing has not yet been completed.

Mr. BENNET. I have not accused the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of doing anything except not reporting it.

Mr. MOON. How can you report a thing until it has been heard, until full hearing is had upon it?

Mr. BENNET. Well, things are done sometimes very suddenly in this House, as, for instance, that rule which was brought in this morning.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the question before the chair, as I understand it, is one of germaneness—not one of limitation at all. This is not a limitation on an appropriation such as is embodied in Rule XXI, because there is no appropriation whatsoever under consideration. If it were a limitation, I would still contend that it is legislation and not limitation upon an appropriation, because you are affecting the existing law.

Even as a limitation on an appropriation bill, it would not be proper, because at present, under existing law, the Postmaster General has authority to carry publications of this character.

The question before the Chair is merely one of germaneness, and, of course, legislating upon a provision as to the character of postal matter that may be carried is not germane to the proposal under consideration, relating to railway-mail pay.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to several rulings.

In the first place, this entire section 17 is legislation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] just offered an amendment to a substantive provision, and the only question before the Chair, even if it should be held that it is not a limitation, is whether it is germane to the section.

There is a ruling of Mr. Burton, a most recent ruling, delivered, I think, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, on this exact point, and there are rulings of Mr. Speaker CLARK in the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses, and of Mr. Speaker CANNON, and a long row back, to this effect: That wherever a legislative provision which under ordinary circumstances would be subject to a point of order is left in a bill, that legislative provision can be amended by any germane amendment. And, acting upon that, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] just offered an amendment, which was acted upon by the committee.

This is certainly germane, because it keeps out of the pay to the railroads all pay for carrying any letter, paper, and so forth, containing a liquor "ad" in a dry State. It is certainly germane and in order, and the House ought to have the privilege—which I have no doubt it desires—of voting on it now and immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. There is no appropriation proposed in the paragraph we are considering now, and for that reason this could not be a limitation and it is not germane to this particular section either. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the sections which was printed by the committee under a misunderstanding. I offer the following committee amendment: On line 24, page 38, strike out "$2" and insert "$4.25."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, line 24, strike out "$2" and insert "$4.25."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether this is in consonance with the recommendation of the Joint Committee on Railway Mail Pay?

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman that the items as put into the bill now, as they appear now, are the same as were in the bill two years ago, but the committee determined to adopt the rate of the last commission. By a misunderstanding this print was made instead of the commission rate, and these are the commission rates that I am proposing now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee how much additional revenue will result to the railroads, estimated on the present Postal Service arising out of this amendment?

Mr. MOON. As a result of the change in the initial charges and the terminal charges in this and two or three subsequent paragraphs, the statisticians of the Post Office Department and of the Interstate Commerce Commission advise us that the increased pay to the railroads would be $1,800,000 or $1,900,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is merely for increased pay for terminal charges?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$1," on page 39, line 5, and insert "$2.75."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, line 5, strike out "$1" and insert "$2.75."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in two instances the committee itself has now brought in amendments to this bill raising the rates of pay to the railways, which would indicate that perhaps the committee had not given this rider such careful consideration as they claim to have given it.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman had listened, he would have known.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I observe that there is a raise of rates in two instances.

Mr. MOON. We propose these rates, to begin with.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman please, I still have a little time. It indicates that the committee was not so thoroughly well prepared to have this matter considered as it has indicated in the last few days.

These experts in the business bring in their amendments now under the rule and have them considered upon the floor in the way they would have had to consider them if the bill had come in the regular way.

Mr. MOON. I want to say to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that. Nothing of that sort has been done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think I was deceived in hearing the amendment read which proposed an increase in the rate.

Mr. MOON. No; but the gentleman misunderstood the reason why it was proposed. The amendment I am now proposing is one agreed upon by the committee in the first place, but in reprinting the bill the old rate was put in instead of this.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this true, that this is the first time the Members of the House have known anything about it? Is not this the first announcement that has been made to the House?

Mr. MOON. We announced it in the debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I venture to say that the new Members of the House, who have no official knowledge that this matter has been discussed for 30 years, as indicated by the committee, have heard of these changes for the first time to-day.

Mr. MOON. I think the new Members are pretty well posted. The trouble appears to be with the old Members. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some of us have been chided for asking questions. We have asked them in good faith, because we wanted the right of consideration. Now, we find that the committee itself, which was infallible yesterday and the day before, is sufficiently fallible to make a few changes in its own report, just as it did in the matter of the surety-bond proposition, which it has eliminated from this rule altogether. Evidently day before yesterday we convinced the committee that something was wrong with the surety-bond proposition, which this Sixty-fourth Congress never heard of before. Evidently we did some public service yesterday when we called attention to it again, because to-day the committee comes forth with a rule which eliminates the surety-bond proposition. They now propose to take it up next year, when after a year's consideration they may perfect the proposition. Now, I again call attention to the fact that twice the railroad rates, which the Postmaster General is to allow under this perfect bill of yesterday or the day before, have been altered so that the rates have gone up in each instance, and evidently the railroads are going to get a little more justice to-day than they were to get yesterday and the day before. That is all.

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the most persistent man—persistent in error and misinformation and refusal to receive the truth—that I ever knew. [Laughter.] I told him awhile ago that these propositions which we are now offering—and I will say for his information that there are four of them—were the original figures fixed by the committee in making up the bill in the first place, but there was a misprint; that was all; and the House was advised of that at the beginning of this debate. Now, the gentleman thinks that because the committee want to correct the bill in accordance with its judgment and its action there has been no consideration of it. Why, as a matter of fact, if the committee had been in error—and they have not been in error about this—common decency would require us to correct the error.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad the committee has seen its error and has corrected it, because it has let the House have a little light on a subject concerning which the House was not informed yesterday and the day before. The Members of the House have been let into the secret for the first time that the committee were in error, even to the extent that there was an error in the committee print. I commend the gentleman again for having taken the House into his confidence to this extent, that he has admitted an error of the committee in this instance, in which the committee are raising the rates that were to have gone through on yesterday.

Mr. MOON. I just want to say in reply to that that the gentleman still persists in misunderstanding or misstating the facts. The committee has done nothing here but what it did originally. It is just proposing the figures agreed upon in the first place, and simply correcting the committee print. I have tried, and I am not going to try any more, to make the gentleman from Pennsylvania understand anything. It is plain to other people.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer another correction at this particular time so that it may go into the RECORD. I hold in my hand a letter from the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, which reads as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Pittsburgh, February 24, 1916.

Hon. M. M. GARLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Chairman JOHN A. MOON, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House, in connection with the hearing of the railway mail pay bill, is reported to have expressed himself to the effect that the resolutions sent in on this subject by commercial organizations were of a stereotyped nature and adopted through railroad influence.

This is certainly not true in regard to the expression of the action of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh. Our resolutions were presented by the committee on postal affairs, composed of 15 members, but 1 of whom is connected with a railroad.

At the meeting of the chamber at which they were adopted—December 23, 1915—our record of attendance of 125 members present shows not more than a half dozen men present connected with the railroads.

This chamber is a deliberative body. All the subjects upon which action is proposed are bulletined to the membership in advance, so that there is full opportunity for study and the exercise of the best judgment.

Yours, very truly,

LOGAN MCKEE, Secretary.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman put that letter into the RECORD?

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the statements contained in that letter are true in part and partly not true. I have said, and say now, that the resolutions offered by the various chambers of commerce upon this subject are in a large degree stereotyped. They are varied by three different forms, I believe, but every one contains the expression "unjust and unfair" without stating any facts which show any injustice or unfairness. I should like to inquire how that chamber of commerce up there, that has never heard anything of the proof and knows nothing about this matter, except what the railroads tell its members, can rightfully assume to tell this committee what it ought to do? While of course we have regard for the judgment of those people, because the members of chambers of commerce are among the very best of our people in this country——

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants a reply——

Mr. MOON. I know that the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh are a very elegant body of gentlemen, and very capable, but they have never investigated this question for a moment.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Wait a minute, if you please. I assume that that chamber of commerce is in the same position that the chamber of commerce of another place was in. It passed one of these stereotyped resolutions, and covered it with a gilt binding, and on the back of it indorsed this bill in the very strongest terms possible, and on the inside denounced the bill, which just shows the want of care of these gentlemen in such matters.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, in reply I would simply say that the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh does take up all subjects that pertain to the welfare of the city of Pittsburgh and carefully consider them.

Mr. MOON. Yes. Who is the statistician of that department upon this bill?

Mr. GARLAND. This is one of the things that they thought might militate against that city, and therefore they thought they had a right to act upon it, and the letter itself explains exactly why and how they did act upon it.

Mr. MOON. Yes; explains that they acted without any sort of information at all, and just said the thing was unjust and unfair, when they knew nothing about it. That is the way they acted upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's criticism can not be made with reference to the Merchants' Association of New York.

Mr. MOON. How is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. It can not refer to the Merchants' Association of New York.

Mr. MOON. I do not refer to the Merchants' Association of New York, but I have a few observations to make about them, if the gentleman desires. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. All right. Would the gentleman prefer to make them now?

Mr. MOON. I will wait until I hear from the gentleman from New York and see if he understands it.

Mr. BENNET. The Merchants' Association of New York took this matter up in an entirely independent way, and its statistician is Mr. F. B. De Berard. After they had concluded their deliberations they went even further and came down before the committee of which the gentleman from Tennessee is the chairman. That association has had—as I presume it now has and usually has—pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission complaints against some of the railroads as to rates, and therefore there can not lie any accusation that the Merchants' Association of New York is under railroad influence. If the gentleman would permit, I would be very glad, indeed, to get unanimous consent to print their report in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Oh, that is in the hearings. I heard all about that and everybody connected with it.

Mr. BENNET. But the House has not heard it.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman can read the hearings. That is the reason the gentleman does not know anything about this bill—he has not read the hearings.

Mr. BENNET. I read them because I am on the Committee on Rules, and had to.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman recollect about what Mr. De Berard said respecting the disinterestedness of that investigation.

Mr. BENNET. I recall that he spoke page after page; but I will ask unanimous consent in order to show that I am willing that what he said should go into the RECORD, that his testimony before the Committee on Rules be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; I object, of course, as I would object to the gentleman's putting in the dictionary.

Mr. BENNET. But that is not a dictionary. That is what the gentleman asked me if I knew about.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman knew about it, then he ought to assume that everybody else knows it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. That is a fair shot and well put; but, knowing all of us as I do, and as the gentleman does, and admitting that I do not know everything that is in the RECORD, although, of course, the gentleman from Tennessee does, the whole 700 pages——

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; I know them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. I still take the liberty of doubting whether the remaining 433 Members of the House do; and, of course, if they do, we will assume that our constituents do not know it, and therefore the gentleman is depriving them of a great pleasure in denying me the privilege of putting the hearings into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment that I desire to propose, to strike out "50 cents" and insert "$2" in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 7, strike out "50 cents" and insert "$2."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by striking out "$2" and inserting "$4.25."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 12, strike out "$2" and insert "$4.25."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service othersies: Provided, That the Postmaster General in his discretion may relieve any of the roads of such service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to correct the spelling of the word "otherwise," in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will properly spell the word.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know whether the Post Office Department or the Government has any control over the location of the post office in the town in reference to the railroad station and whether that authority is exercised?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Do they have any control over it?

Mr. FESS. Yes. For example, does the Government fix the place where this mail is to be delivered by the railroads without regard to the convenience of the railroad at all?

Mr. MADDEN. The law fixes that.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is not correct. The department fixes it, and where the Government has no public building, then generally the Post Office Department, through an inspector, locates the premises and rents, and that is the way the location of the post office is established.

Mr. FESS. The question I desire to ask is whether the Government in the location of a post office either by an inspector or by law takes into consideration the distance the railroad company has to carry the mail from the depot?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I hardly think they would take that into consideration. They might, because the law authorizes them to locate a post office.

Mr. FESS. Is it altogether fair to the railroads for the Government without consulting the railroads to fix the distance and require them to carry the mail that distance to and from the depot?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would say that under existing law the railroad company is required to deliver the mail from the train to any post office within 80 rods.

Mr. FINLEY. This paragraph, beginning line 1, page 41, only relates to station service. It has no connection whatever with the transporting of mails to and from post offices.

Mr. FESS. Well, in many towns where we have no Federal buildings the railroad delivers the mail to and from a distant point. I note they offer this as an objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Where the distance is within 80 rods.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, under the law the railroads deliver it when it is within 80 rods.

Mr. FESS. In my home town the new location is nearer to the railroad station, and the change was made largely with that point in view, although it is not so convenient to the patrons.

Mr. FINLEY. When the post office is within 80 rods of the railroad station is the present law. This paragraph has no connection with that.

Mr. FESS. To-day I understand the railroad has to deliver the mail to the depot.

Mr. FINLEY. That has been the law all these years, that where the distance does not exceed 80 rods in length the railroad delivers the mail at the post office and carries the mail from the post office to the railroad station. Where it exceeds 80 rods in length, there is a messenger, and the Government pays that messenger for the service of transporting the mails to and from the post office.

Mr. FESS. That is the information I want.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman must understand that in measuring the mileage rates they count the distance from the railway to the post office as a part of the line.

Mr. FINLEY. It is only at terminal points where the railroad has a terminus. In no other case does the distance count from the station to the post office.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendmend is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In computing the car miles of full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I am not thoroughly convinced yet but that the small lines of railways will be seriously injured by this bill—that is to say, the railroads that are not able to make and do not make a long run and whose property is limited. I am not sure that the postal department under this bill will not have an undue advantage of such short-line railroads, and that is one of the reasons why I have asked on several occasions for a fuller consideration than we have had here or could have under a rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Look at page 48, beginning line 12, and read:

After the rate specified in this act——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have read that, if the gentleman pleases, and while I would like to see that a little fuller than it is, I understand it. I have no real objection to the Interstate Commerce Commission having original jurisdiction of this matter rather than to have these reports back and forth and having the additional bookkeeping that is necessary, and all incidental charges that will fall on the poor railroads, and there are some poor railroads in this country to-day. Now, I make that statement even though I am a waterways man. What I desire to say now is this: Since several gentlemen have indicated that some of us were lacking in knowledge upon this general proposition, and one or two gentlemen in particular have insinuated that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not given careful study to the bill, I am going to ask one or two questions now in view of getting facts.

It has been reported to me that express rates are much higher than the freight rates and the postal rates, as they would be under this bill; that the express rates run from 100 to 200 per cent higher than freight rates. Now, if that statement is not correct, I wish to have it denied.

Mr. MADDEN. I can say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania this: The express companies are owned either by the railroad companies or by the men who are managing the railroad companies, I do not know which, but whatever happens to be the fact in the case this is a fact, that the railroad companies themselves receive 50 per cent of the express companies' receipts for the work that the railroad companies themselves do. That is all they do receive.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then apparently the law is being very grossly violated in some respects, and some officers of the law are not paying very close attention to their duties if these express companies are owned by the railroad companies. I hope the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether that statement is accurate. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the gentleman is rather on the wrong track——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I have been told that several times. If that is all the gentleman from Minnesota has to tell me to put me on the right track——

Mr. STEENERSON. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question now, because I only have two minutes left.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will endeavor to get more time for the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer the question, then.

Mr. STEENERSON. The point I want to make is this, that where the railroads complain of the competition of the Post Office Department in the freight business and express business it is based upon the postage rate.

We are now talking about the rate the United States pays to the railroads. Now, if we pay a high rate to the railroads, that does not relieve them from competition. We might pay a dollar a pound to the railroads. If we accept the carriage of that parcel-post matter, for instance, at 2 cents a pound and the express rate is 5 cents a pound, that would be in competition with the express business of the railroad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are you not in competition anyhow?

Mr. STEENERSON. My point is——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman answer? Is there not direct competition?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly. I am not arguing that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, then, will the gentleman answer categorically whether it is true or not true that express rates are now 100 to 200 per cent higher than freight rates?

Mr. STEENERSON. In some places.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, we are getting right. We are beginning to see why a great proposition like this ought to be discussed on the floor of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. There are places in the country where the transportation of freight is very expensive on these short-line roads and where the freight rate is higher than the postage rate, but that question has little to do with the question of railway-mail pay, because the United States does not determine the amount they pay to the railroad by the amount of postage they charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. STEENERSON. I hope the gentleman will have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall have to be satisfied with the gentleman's acknowledgment that there is competition for the present, so far as that question is concerned. There is no denial that express rates are higher than freight rates. That is the first proposition.

Now, I am told that express rates are from 100 to 200 per cent higher, for instance, as between Philadelphia and New York, than freight rates or mail rates, and, if that is so, let me ask whether there is any denial of this statement, that 10 tons of freight, first class, proceeding 92 miles, from New York to Philadelphia, would cost $46.20, whereas on the space-basis system as proposed in this rider the same 10 tons, going by United States mail, would cost only $27.82, or substantially one-half that freight rate?

Mr. STEENERSON. But the railroad——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, answer, yes or no. I am trying to get some facts now.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have no doubt your statement is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why do not we have this light thrown on the subject when we are discussing a great proposition that affects all sections of the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. The point I am making is that it is not the question of how much we pay the railroad for transportation that affects their competition, but the rate of postage that we charge, because if we pay a railroad company too little or too much it does not determine the postage rates. And if the United States sends it at a loss they still compete with the freight and express.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking whether it is not a fact that under this rider brought in here in the manner it is it does not give the Government of the United States the right to send 10 tons of mail matter from New York to Philadelphia, 92 miles, for $27.82, whereas the ordinary freight rate between those two cities is $46.20?

Mr. STEENERSON. But the gentleman is now talking only to the question of whether the United States is doing a profitable business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am trying to show whether you are giving the railroads a fair deal or not; that is all.

Mr. STEENERSON. That has nothing to do with the question you are trying to discuss.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has everything to do with it, because it has been stated by one member of the committee, at least, which brought in this rider, that whereas it would cost $90 to send 10 tons of express matter from New York to Philadelphia, 92 miles, it would cost $46.20 to send 10 tons by freight over the same route, and by this postal system that you are thrusting upon the railroads, and from which they can not extricate themselves, you force them to carry it first class for $27.82.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Would it make any difference whether we paid the railroad companies the same amount that we pay the express companies?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would make a great difference to the railroads.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman means it would take their business away and turn it into the postal business?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think so. But the railroads have the right to live, otherwise we would have no chance to reach the country from which the gentleman from Minnesota comes. The railroad brought him to town, and I do not want to tear up the tracks of the railroads by imposing burdens on it that it can not bear.

Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] charged me with not knowing much about this subject yesterday. I want to ask him whether it is not true that it costs $70 to take 10 tons of freight from New York to Boston, while under your system you are compelling the railroads to carry it for the Government for——

Mr. FINLEY. I am making no charge against the gentleman at all. I simply admit it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then where does the railroad come in on that proposition? Why have we not heard of this before?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of it costing the Government $27 to transport 10 tons from New York to Boston. Now he says the charge for express would bring a revenue to the express company of $46. Now, the railroad company gets one-half of that, or $23.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken. He and I never differ except in a matter of ignorance [laughter], and yesterday he charged me with ignorance. I asked him the question whether the transportation of 10 tons of freight, traveling first class from Philadelphia to New York, did not cost $46.20, as against $27.82 that you propose to force the railroads to carry it for over the same distance?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman brings up an illustration that the railroads receive for carrying 10 tons of freight from Philadelphia to New York $27.82.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am much obliged to the gentleman for the light he has thrown on the subject already, and I have a few more questions that I will ask in connection with the next paragraphs. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman speaks of the railroads receiving $27 for transporting 10 tons of freight and of the express company receiving $46. Well, the railroads receive 50 per cent of that $46, and therefore the railroads ought to receive $23. Now, the Government furnishes the railway mail clerks in the cars, and they have charge of the mail, and the railroad companies will get $27 instead of $23. They will receive more money than they did before.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I have read all of the hearings on this question of the change of railway mail pay. I have done more than that. I have studied the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I do him the compliment of saying that his speech is worthly not only of a careful reading but of a careful study.

But I am in confusion on this question, and it is not clear in my mind, after reading all of these hearings. It has been stated that the Government will pay more and the railroads will get more under the new proposition than under the old. If that be true, I wonder why the opposition comes so strongly from the railroads. I have to question whether that be true or not. Also, if it be true, I am wondering why there is such a contention on the part of the Government to make a change which involves a higher rate of pay. Why should we do that?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that we are not paying for the full weight yet. It is not until the weighing of 1917 that we will find out how much we are to pay under this new system.

Mr. FESS. Do I understand that under the arrangement later on we will not be paying as much as we do now?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is the theory of this legislation in 1918. For instance, the railway-mail pay will be less under the space plan than it is under the weight plan, because, as it is now, we are not paying for the full weight. We are not paying until we have the weighing of 1917 and 1918.

Mr. FESS. In other words, until that change is made, the Government will be paying more. After that change is made, the Government will be paying less.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is true.

Mr. FESS. That being the case, I should like to know why we should make the change from weight, which seems to me absolutely fair, to space, which, in my mind, is still in doubt? Why should we demand the carrying of the mails on a different basis from any other transportation?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question? I will not take up much time. The space basis was originally suggested by the railroad companies. The New Haven Railroad Co. was one of the companies that suggested the space basis. Afterwards they changed their minds, but they have not been able to change the minds of other men who have studied it, and that is the reason why this controversy is on.

Mr. FESS. Why is the weight basis a less equitable or fair plan than the space basis?

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place, to-day we are paying for a combination of space and weight. We are paying $5,000,000 a year for the space in railroad post-office cars, and paying so much a ton per mile for hauling the mail matter besides. Now, some of us do not think we ought to pay for both space and weight, and we think that the way to obviate that is to pay for space, and to pay for the movement of the space so much a car mile. What is there simpler in the world than to calculate the number of car miles that a car is run at so much a mile?

Mr. FESS. Now, may I ask another question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I wish to ask about the statement that a ton and a half would be paid for to-day in weight, but that if it was paid for by space you might have 20 tons in the car and pay no more than the payment for but 1½ tons.

Mr. MADDEN. That is absurd. Everybody knows that where a car has a capacity of 20 tons, and it is carrying 7½ tons to-day—not a ton and a half, but seven and a half—you can not load 20 tons into the car unless you can load compact stuff, like bricks or books, or something of that sort. The gentleman must know that if they loaded straw hats into the car they would not have 2 tons in the car when it was loaded to its full space capacity, and there would not be one car in every hundred that could be loaded to its full capacity.

Mr. FESS. In paying by weight would not the Government be the gainer rather than the railroads, if you filled the car with less weight, like straw hats? And in case of heavy material the gain would still be greater?

Mr. MADDEN. The Government would, because the Government proposes to pay the railroad companies for the space in the car, whether there is anything in the car or not; but experience, which has been verified by the investigation, leads to the conclusion that the method of payment by space is not only the most equitable but the most scientific, the most just, and the most reasonable way that can be devised for paying for the movement of the mail.

Mr. FESS. I want to confess that the gentleman from Illinois has shaken me considerably by his address the other day, but I still am unconvinced that we ought to change from a weight basis to a space basis, because it would seem to me that the weight basis is fair to everybody, while the space basis is in doubt in my mind.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, everybody will have to form his own opinion about that.

Mr. FESS. The limitation of weight of parcel secured by the amendment of the Member from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] cures one defect and goes far to remove one serious objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In computing the car-miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take a few moments now to read a few more statistics that may be of interest to the new Members of the House in particular. It is conceded by leading members of the committee that the express rates are from 100 to 200 per cent higher——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make any motion?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word. Having done that, I call attention to the fact that leading members of the committee have admitted that express rates are from 100 to 200 per cent higher than freight rates, and that freight rates are considerably higher than the rates that would be payable under this postal plan that has been brought in under the rule without the ordinary method of consideration in the House.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the gentleman's authority for saying that anybody has admitted such a state of facts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Minnesota admitted it.

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody admits it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was admitted by the gentleman from Minnesota and also by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. I made no such admission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the RECORD will show that for purposes of convenience, at least, the gentleman made the admission.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. I made no such admission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I make the statement now that I have been informed that, so far as the earnings of the railroads for this United States mail service, as proposed, are concerned, as compared with first-class freight in 10-ton lots, it would result about as follows on a run from Richmond, Va., to Wilmington, N. C., a distance of 244 miles. The express rate being 100 or more per cent higher than the freight rate, as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what railroad made the statement from which he is reading?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One of the very best of them; possibly it is a combination of railroads; but the facts have not been disputed by any member of the committee. We must get our information from some source if we can not get it from the committee in the ordinary way. So I say that on this run of 244 miles, whereas the express rates would be 100 per cent higher than those I am about to quote, 10 tons of freight would pay $100 as against $59.74 that would be paid on the space basis for the United States mail.

The railroad would get about half for carrying the mail that it gets for carrying first-class freight. Therefore there is a pretty sure loss to the railroad company on that run from Richmond, Va., to Wilmington, N. C., if these facts be true, and they do not appear to have been disputed thus far. On a run of 107 miles from Charlotte, N. C., to Greenville, S. C., the home of one of the distinguished members of this committee, whereas the express rate would be high and there would be some profit in it for the railroad company—and it may get some profit out of the freight also—using the 10 tons as an illustration, the cost of 10 tons of freight would be $112, as against $29.97 that the United States would pay for carrying the mail. Why, if this be true, they get almost four times as much in North and South Carolina for carrying freight as they would get for carrying the United States mail under this proposed system.

Mr. HILL. And may I not inquire if the express rates the gentleman has quoted have not been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; and the mail rates are fixed by this rider.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The freight rates have also been fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is true. Now, I want to have the House informed as to the figures on the run of 153 miles from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Morristown, Tenn.

The freight rate for 10 tons would be $120, and the United States mail rate, under the legisaltion forced by this rider, would be $40.63 on the space basis. Apparently the Government would pay about one-third in this southern country for carrying mail as against its earnings for ordinary freight, and the express rate would be 100 per cent higher, as I am informed. When it comes to a run like that from New York to San Francisco, a distance of 3,185 miles, the cost of 10 tons of freight would be $740, and the Government, for its mail on the space basis, would pay $679.38.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So it appears from this illustration—which in some respects the members of the committee have admitted, and which they do not appear to have refuted—the railroad is likely to lose money on the space basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is authorized to make special contracts with the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails where in his judgment the conditions warrant the application of higher rates than those herein specified.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not it is the purpose and intention of this provision that the Postmaster General may, in the first instance, enter into a contract with the short-line railroads to give them fair compensation for services actually performed, without waiting until the Postmaster General has fixed the rate, and then have them take the provisions of the bill where it requires 50 per cent of the trackage of the railroads to consent before relief can be had.

Mr. MOON. I explained that to the gentleman from California. This bill provides a maximum rate to be fixed by Congress. Now, it will happen—because we are legislating for the average, we can not legislate for isolated railroads, but for average roads throughout the country—it will happen clearly that additional compensation will come to every one of the railroads under this bill over that provided in the present law. It also will happen that as to some of the short-line railroads, particularly where they make very frequent trips—as the proof shows in this case, a little road in Tennessee and North Carolina will be getting three times as much as it ought to have, the Postmaster General might correct that by an order directing the mail be carried twice instead of three or four times a day—it will also happen, beyond question, in the striking of these averages that some of the short-line railroads—and most of the roads beyond the Rocky Mountains are short-line roads—will not get full and adequate compensation under this bill. They will get, however, more than they are getting now, while it will not be full in some instances. Therefore a provision is put in this bill that they may go to the Postmaster General and contract—they can do that separately and individually—for a full and adequate compensation. They do not have to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission for that purpose.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman explain right there? Now, before an order is effected as to the short lines, before entering into the contract, does this provision authorize the Postmaster General to take all the data that is within his department and the data that he has gathered which shows that the railroads are receiving less now than any other service for the transportation of the mail and allow them a fair compensation for the service to be performed in the future?

Mr. MOON. It does, after the passage of the bill, and that is what it says, in effect.

Mr. RAKER. Then, so far as the short-line railroads are concerned, the general provisions of the bill are put in the discretion of the Postmaster General? Is that it?

Mr. MOON. No; the general provision of the bill is to fix a maximum rate which, as I said, the statisticians of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the department say will give a better rate to all roads—long lines and short roads—than under the present law; but inasmuch as some of the railroads are short-line railroads and will fall below the average of the rate by reason of their condition—the length of the line, the infrequency of their trips—they will in some instances get less under this bill than they ought to have, still it is more than they get under the present law. Then, whenever that fact is presented to the Postmaster General any separate road may go to him and present whatever facts they may have, and he may take all the facts that are in the department and make a separate contract to give to them a rate to which they are entitled.

Mr. RAKER. But the Postmaster General can not go beyond this maximum average provided in the bill, can he?

Mr. MOON. Yes; he can go beyond it; that is the purpose of it. Now, we fix a maximum price and we have a special provision permitting him to go beyond that and pay more, as justice requires to be done. The very purpose of this section is to give him power which he would not otherwise have, and which he has not now under the law, to contract for a higher rate with these roads.

Mr. RAKER. Then, in a few words, if there are, say, six hundred and some odd independent short-line railroads that claim and are able to show, and the department records show, they are receiving less for the transportation of the mail than they actually should, after this bill becomes operative, in future contracts for the service to be performed the Postmaster General can fix a contract which would adequately provide for their just compensation?

Mr. MOON. Assuredly; even if it should amount to twice the maximum fixed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is the question I wanted to ask, whether or not the maximum would interfere with the Postmaster General treating fairly these little short-line railroads, for instance, in the mountains that have to dig through 20 or 30 feet of snow pretty nearly every day for a month and only make one trip a day, and sometimes but one a week—whether or not they can be taken care of under this provision of this law?

Mr. MOON. Every one of them can be cared for under this proposition, and that is the purpose of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes further. I just want to get a little further information on this line. I will ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. What remedy has the short-line railroads—that is what I am talking about—for any arbitrary action on the part of the Postmaster General as to fixing rates that they think are not sufficient?

Mr. MOON. If a short-line road thinks it is not getting enough—and I want the gentleman to bear in mind they are getting more under this provision than they have heretofore gotten—if they think they are not getting enough—and that may be true as to a few cases, because you can legislate, as I said, only for the average—they have a right to present the facts to the Postmaster General and make a contract for an additional sum.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any method by which they can have any relief if the Postmaster General holds against them?

Mr. MOON. Of course, you have to leave this to somebody. Every question has to be decided by some authority. You can not provide for appeal after appeal. Now, this special-contract provision is limited to the action of the Postmaster General. That would be the end of it so far as that is concerned, but if 51 per cent of the roads, both big and little, are not satisfied with the action of the department, then the right to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission is preserved. The gentleman will readily see that we can not provide two appeals or two exceptions to the general law from the Postmaster General for an individual road. We provide a reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission for 51 per cent of the roads.

Mr. RAKER. In addition to what the gentleman has stated about making a special contract with these short-line railroads, if the Postmaster General is arbitrary and fixes the contract, or will not enter into a contract that will remunerate them for their services, they can then file a complaint, if they can get 51 per cent of the railroads. That is as to mileage, is it?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. To enforce them, they can then take their short-line railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission and have them fix the rate?

Mr. MOON. Surely.

Mr. RAKER. Now, if they fix the rate—that is, the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rate—is the Postmaster General bound to fix that amount as the amount he allows?

Mr. MOON. Whatever the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes will be reported to the House for a general law on the subject, because it is not considered desirable for the House to yield its jurisdiction entirely to this question in every phase. But I want to say to the gentleman that the present Postmaster General, like every one we have ever had, will do the utmost that he can under the law to protect all of these roads. Under the present law he is powerless to make any special contract, and he can not give them any relief, and we are seeking to give relief to those who may need it. This measure is as fair as it can possibly be, in my judgment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is there any way that the short-line roads could appeal other than by securing 51 per cent of all the roads?

Mr. MOON. Fifty-one per cent of the roads would have to go into an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all the roads, as far as that is concerned, not only the short-line roads, will have the right to have a contract separate and apart from all others, with the Postmaster General, by which they can get a figure higher than the maximum fixed in this bill, if the facts justify it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But the short-line roads themselves can not get a separate appeal.

Mr. MOON. We can not deal with short lines or long lines, because we would not be able to tell which is a short line or a long line. There is no standard by which we can tell.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman mean to say they will get more under this provision than they are now getting? Will they get an increase of pay for the same amount of service?

Mr. MOON. The same amount of service. They will get more under this bill than they are getting under the law now.

Mr. RAKER. The condition now, by the testimony before the committee as well as by personal investigation, particularly with regard to the short-line railroads in northern California, of which I have knowledge, shows that those roads are running behind.

Mr. MOON. I think that is true of all those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that it is Saturday and 5 o'clock. There is no possibility of finishing the bill tonight. There is an amendment to be offered to this paragraph.

Mr. FINLEY. I will wait until Monday.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT MINORITY VIEWS.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to have three legislative days in which to file minority views on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I am opposed to certain recommendations in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] asks unanimous consent that he shall have three legislative days in which to file his views on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I presume it will not in any wise delay the consideration of the legislative bill.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, no; I was called home and was not able to do this before.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of efficiency in the Government service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of efficiency in the Government service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by introducing a telegram that I have received from sundry citizens of Tennessee on our foreign policy, and a letter on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram signed by sundry citizens of Tennessee on the subject of our foreign relations, and also certain letters.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—I believe I will not object, although it is an exceedingly bad practice, followed only by gentlemen after they are elected to the Senate and not merely after they are nominated. They read anything of that sort, to fill up the RECORD interminably. If we did that here, the House proceedings would be 400 pages long every day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am obliged to the gentleman for not objecting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, February 28, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

EXPORT OF STEEL FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have nothing to say upon the water-power bill; all I want to do is to get it out of the way, but I have been waiting two or three days now to get into the RECORD a letter I received recently. I think it is of sufficient importance to ask that it be read for the information of the Senate. I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

103 PARK AVENUE,
New York City, February 25, 1916.

DEAR SIR: I call your attention to the fact that there should immediately be appointed a commission to sit in New York and at other points to hear the views of small manufacturers.

One of them was in my office to-day. Have been negotiating with him about a boiler for some time. But he can't get the material, and he has the only type of boiler that suits my purposes. He says the material has advanced in price from 200 to 300 per cent; that he can not get deliveries made for nine months—and people get tired of waiting; that he might as well shut up shop till the war is over; that things are getting worse; that all the steel is going to Europe for war purposes; and that nobody can get any here, except what little is left over. He says that things are in a very rotten condition.

Somebody ought to take action on this and investigate it. It is a most important thing. The prosperity of the country depends on the great mass of little business houses and they are simply being stifled.

Our local trade in the iron industry will be scotched and foreign trade will be worse than ever by the close of the war if this situation continues, and home demands should come first. This is much more important than the question of saving the lives of fools on belligerent ships. In 9 cases in 10 they ought to be killed for being fools; I have no regard for a fool, whether on land or on the sea. I think any sensible man ought to be allowed to shoot a fool on sight—as the world is too full of them anyway. Osler has never expressed his opinion on this, but I am giving you mine.

I hope you will act on the suggestion.

Yours, truly, D. F. PENINGTON, M. D.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. NELSON. I understand the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has a substitute for that amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. After considering the matter I wish to submit an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proposed as a substitute for the pending amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all in line 23 after the word "war," including the semicolon, and all of lines 24, 25, and 26, on page 6, and insert in lieu of the same the following:

And in valuing the land for this purpose he shall be governed by the laws of the State wherein the land is situated applicable to condemnation proceedings in the exercise of the power of eminent domain to appropriate property privately owned to a public purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is compelled to state that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, unless withdrawn, is first in order, for the reason that it proposes to perfect the part which the amendment now seeks to strike out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to look at the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and then I can see whether I shall withdraw my amendment, if the Senate will indulge me for a minute. [After a pause.] It seems to me that this amendment covers the situation I have been claiming, that the right of the Government in valuing the lands should prevail, and therefore I am willing to withdraw the amendment which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "value," in line 22 on page 26, to and including the word "grantee," in line 26, page 6, and in lieu thereof insert, following the word "value":

As may be fixed by the Secretary of War; in ascertaining the value of the land the Secretary of War shall be governed by the rules of the law in force in the State or Territory in which it is situated, applicable to proceedings wherein private property is sought to be taken for a public use.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will state wherein the essential difference between the amendment I have offered and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee lies. First, my amendment strikes out the words "as land" and gets rid of the inference many people have drawn from the use of that term or those words; and it refers the Secretary of War to the laws of the State or Territory in which the land is situated. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that the Secretary of War, in ascertaining the rule that he is to apply, must go to the laws of some State. The United States has no law upon that subject, and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would leave the Secretary of War without guidance in that respect.

Then a word with regard to the words "as land"——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think I can obviate some discussion if the Senator will allow me to make a statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield, of course, if it would obviate any argument upon it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have read the Senator's amendment, and I can see that there is no difference between the Senator's amendment and the one the committee has offered. His amendment requires the Secretary of War to fix charges according to the value of the property, and the bill as it now stands taken as amended by the committee amendment means the same thing. The Senator merely strikes out the word "land" and says the charges shall be fixed according to its value. For the committee I am willing to strike out the word "land" and thus accept the Senator's amendment. I will not be captious about a word when the two amendments mean the same thing. I am very anxious to make some progress with the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well, if the Senator from Tennessee accepts the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Tennessee withdraws his amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. And accepts that of the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to look at the amendment first. We have spent a good deal of time on it. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa explain the difference between his amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are just two differences. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee preserves the words "as land," so that the law would read, if this amendment were adopted and the bill passed:

The grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges, based upon its value as land, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment I have offered would read:

The grantee shall pay to the United States such reasonable charges based upon its value—

That is, the land that is proposed to be taken—as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

It then proceeds to lay down the rule by which the Secretary of War is to be controlled in fixing the value of the land, namely the rule of law applicable to the taking of private property for public use in the State or Territory in which the land is situated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, I should like the Senator from Iowa to state wherein his amendment differs from the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I have just stated the difference.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have been trying to read the language, and have not been able to catch all that the Senator has stated.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment which I have offered omits the words "as land" and inserts the provision that in ascertaining the value of the land the rule of law applicable shall be the rule in the State or Territory in which the land is situated. I have omitted the words "as land" because they can serve no useful purpose and would confuse the Secretary of War in the performance of his duty. He will have certain land before him which the grantee desires to take; it will be his duty to ascertain the value of that land; and in my amendment I have laid down the rule by which he is to do it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado that the legal effect of the two amendments is identical. If the Senator from Colorado is in favor of the Shields amendment, he has no reason to have any scruples about adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, their legal effect being, as I have stated, identical.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the only difficulty in my mind was whether or not the effect was identical; and, inasmuch as I had never seen the amendment which has been offered, I thought it would be well to look at it carefully. If the Senator from Tennessee is thoroughly convinced that the rights under this amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa are identical with the rights under his amendment, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do think they are the same. I think the amendment proposed by me is more precise and clear and conforms better with the general frame of the bill; but, as I said awhile ago, I am not going to be captious about whose words are used in the bill when the same object is accomplished.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the legal effect of the two amendments be exactly the same, I confess I can scarcely see the object of the substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if there would not be in reality a little difference in the effect? Under the proposition that the value of the land must be fixed merely as its value as land, would not that practically mean land used for agricultural purposes only? On the other hand, if we are to simply seek the value of the land, may not the Secretary of War determine that the value is such as that land would have if it were sold for the specific purpose of building a dam, and might it not, therefore, if it happened to be the only spot in the vicinity in which a dam could be constructed, be far more valuable—that is, if put up to the highest bidder, where there would be a contest for it, would it not bring a price perhaps a hundred times as high as it would for mere agricultural purposes—and would not that be the real effect of the amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, no one can be absolutely certain with regard to the interpretation which a judge will put upon any given language. I think it is more than probable that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is right in saying that a judge would construe these two amendments as having the same legal effect; but there is in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] an opportunity for a judge to do precisely what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has suggested. I do not want the value of the land to be fixed with reference to its agricultural purpose only. I think that if one owns land which is suitable for an improvement of this sort its value must be determined, not only with reference to its agricultural worth but its suitability for any purpose to which it can be put. If my amendment be adopted—and I am glad that the Senator from Tennessee has accepted it—there would be no doubt whatsoever with regard to that result.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that I entirely agree with him on that point, and that I also agree with him upon the proposition that the agricultural value of the land ought not to be the basis of its valuation, but I think that his amendment is in legal effect broader than the amendment heretofore offered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that when the Senator from Minnesota said that the two amendments had the same legal effect he did not refer to the language in the bill as it is now, but meant that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa had the same legal effect as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to be misunderstood. I was directing my remarks to a comparison between the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee and the amendment which I have offered. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee preserves the language of the bill in so far as to include the words "as land," but my amendment does not include these words.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think both amendments mean the same thing, and I accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa on that ground; but if the discussion is to go on I might as well not have accepted it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we have made more real progress this morning than we have made at any time during the discussion of this bill. I want to congratulate the Senator from Tennessee and those who opposed and voted against the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to strike out the words "as land," and those who opposed the amendment which I offered the next day, wherein I undertook to strike out the proposition that the benefits to navigation should be considered, because, in my judgment, the Senator from Tennessee has now come to just where we would have been if we had adopted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana and my amendment. The Senator from Tennessee has offered an amendment to strike out the same language which I undertook to strike out, and which, to my mind, is exceedingly objectionable; and even though those of us who favored that amendment failed to convince the Senate, I am glad that the Senator from Tennessee has finally been won over, and through him, of course, we shall get the Senate.

The same thing might be said about the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa proposes to strike out the language which the Senator from Montana undertook to have stricken out, and also the language which I undertook to have stricken out, and leaves the rule of damages where it would be if there were no provision whatever made in regard to it. So, while the Senator from Tennessee thinks that there is no difference, in my judgment the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa accomplishes what a few of us have been laboring for a week to accomplish, and which the Senator so bitterly opposed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senator from Nebraska is satisfied with this amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Nebraska is going to vote for the amendment. He thinks it accomplishes the same thing, in one stroke and in a few minutes, that the Senator from Montana and himself spent a week trying to accomplish but had failed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, I hope that we may have a vote on it, if there is no opposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. If I am not interrupted I shall not take much of the time of the Senate.

The Senator from Montana undertook to strike out of the bill the rule that would require the Secretary of War in putting a value upon land of the United States which might be taken to value that land as land. After we had failed in that I undertook to strike out the proposition that compelled the Secretary to offset against what little value he might put on the land according to its worth for the purpose of raising corn or beans the benefit that might accrue to navigation. Now we have agreed to strike all that out and insert a rule that would be the law if a proceeding to condemn this property went into court anywhere. In other words, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as he offered it this morning would, in my judgment, have the effect, so far as it goes, of striking out the objectionable words which I tried to strike out on Saturday; but the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa and accepted by the Senator from Tennessee strikes out, in addition to those words, the words which the Senator from Montana undertook to strike out.

If the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee were adopted, it would eliminate the requirement which compels the Secretary to offset against the value of the land the benefits to navigation; but if there were taken any land of the United States which had any improvements on it, such as trees used for park purposes or public buildings used for post offices or United States courts, or anything of that kind, there would be no allowance made for the value of the buildings. As modified by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, we will get the value of the property taken, including buildings and all other improvements, whatever it may be. That, in my judgment, is right and what we have been trying to get, lo, these many days, and I am delighted to know that we have finally converted our opponents to an agreement on such a fair basis.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the next amendment which I have to offer is complementary to the one last offered by me and adopted. That amendment made the permit begin to run from the date of the permit, instead of from the time of the completion of the work. After the word "grantee," in line 21, on page 9, I move to insert the words "either before or after the lapse of the period of the permit."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 21, after the word "grantee," it is proposed to insert the words "either before or after the lapse of the period of the permit."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I imagine there will be no objection to that amendment. The language as it reads would seem to imply that the notice would not be proper until after the lapse of the full period of 50 years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I desire time to examine the amendment. It has not been printed.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that, in my judgment, one year is really not quite fair to the permittee. I would make that two years. It seems to me that he ought to have more than a year's notice of the purpose to take over the plant. I merely offer that as a suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator mean that the Government can take the plant over at any time during the 50-year period?

Mr. WALSH. No; but after the lapse of 49 years the Government could then give notice that it would take the plant over at the end of the period.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, do I understand that the amendment of the Senator will make the section read as follows:

SEC. 6. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the rights hereunder granted upon the giving to the grantee either before or after the lapse of the period of the permit of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir; that is to say, at the end of 49 years the Government may give notice that it will take over the plant.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do I understand that the Government of the United States, under this amendment of the Senator, can not touch the leasehold estate during the period of 50 years?

Mr. WALSH. It can not cut it short.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It can not touch that at all, but can give notice that it will take it over?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before the expiration of that time, if it so desires?

Mr. WALSH. It can give notice before its expiration that it will take it over promptly on the expiration of the 50-year period.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands provides:

That upon not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right, upon the expiration of any lease, to take over the properties of the lessee.

This bill provides that upon one year's notice the Government might take such action. The amendment of the Senator from Montana is to the effect that that one year's notice may be given before the expiration of the 50-year lease, which, taking it without any further modification, would merely have the effect of shortening the term one year. That is all the effect it would have. If the notice is extended to two years, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, it would have no effect whatever upon the matter; and for that reason it does seem to me that the Senator is a little captious in his amendment; but I am willing to accept his amendment, if the three-year limit can be put in, just as in the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, which the Senator favors.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree to that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, I suggest that the Senator so modify his amendment, and I will accept it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not quite think that the comment of the Senator upon my amendment is what it deserves. I do not think it is captious.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not mean to give the Senator any offense.

Mr. WALSH. Moreover, Mr. President, I have not attempted to change the one-year provision. That is the committee's proposition and not mine. I took the precaution to say that I did not think that was enough, but that the permittee ought to have at least two years, and I am quite willing that he should have three years.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly I meant no reflection upon the Senator, but I was calling attention to the fact that the amendment suggested by him would absolutely make no change in the length of the permit. Now, I understand the Senator to agree to modify his amendment so as to make it three years.

Mr. WALSH. No; that is not my amendment at all. I am willing to agree to three years. If the Senator from Tennessee suggests three years, I should say "yes."

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest three years.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; I agree to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that if this were made three years instead of one year, then it would really shorten the period of the lease three years.

Mr. WALSH. Not at all. At the end of 47 years the Government will give three years' notice to the effect that at the end of 50 years it will take the plant over.

Mr. SMOOT. I had not concluded what I was going to say.

Mr. WALSH. Excuse me.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had, I think the Senator would have understood my point better. I say, without the amendment of the Senator from Montana, of course; and if it were changed to one year, then, of course, it would shorten the period three years, because of the fact that if the amendment of the Senator were adopted it would take three years after the full period of 50 years had elapsed before the Government could take over the property. But with the Senator's amendment, and also the one suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, it would make no difference, in my opinion, whether it were one or three years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have it stated, because I do not clearly understand the amendment as it is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 21, after the word "grantee," it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words:

Either before or after the lapse of the period of the permit.

Also, in line 21, it is proposed to strike out "one year's" and in lieu thereof to insert "three years'."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suppose we are entitled to have the amendment divided, and I should like very much to have that done. There are really two amendments in one there. I should like to vote on them separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a right which the Senator has.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is very important.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is very important.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I mean it.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether he has any objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have already stated that.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that the talk over there was really a conversation, and there was so much confusion that we could not hear it over here.

Mr. SHIELDS. With the modification that three years' notice shall be given, I have accepted it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the first part of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the second part of the amendment, to strike out "one" and insert "three."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I move to insert "two" instead of "three."

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment is accepted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington, to strike out "one" and insert "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as a substitute for the pending bill the matter which I send to the desk. I ask to have it printed and lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offers a substitute for the entire bill, which will be printed and lie over.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we have now arrived at section 6, which is beyond doubt the most important section in the bill. It presents one of two debated and debatable fundamental questions involved in this bill. Section 6 deals with the recapture of the property by the Government at the expiration of the period of the franchise. I send to the desk an amendment to that section, the language offered to be incorporated at the end of the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 6, to come on page 10, line 23, after the word "granted," the following words: ", nor for the diversion or generating works or appurtenances or the land on which the same may be situated, beyond the cost of the same, with all proper deductions for depreciation; nor shall more than the cost be claimed or allowed for any water rights or rights of way used in connection with the property to be acquired."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the course of a colloquy some days ago between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], a member of the committee which reported the bill under consideration, the latter declared that the permit or franchise, for the granting of which it makes provision, is practically perpetual; that though it nominally extends over a period of 50 years only, when, under the bill, the Government may take over the plant through which the privilege is exercised, with its appurtenances, the conditions attending the recapture, if that term may be used, are so burdensome as to make it unlikely that the right will ever be availed of. First among the conditions imposed is that the fair value of the plant at the time it is taken over, which will not be less than 50 years hence, shall be paid. The Senator finds no reason to object to the burdensome terms, for he frankly admits that in his own view the permit ought to be perpetual. It is a fair statement, accordingly, that in the opinion of one of the Senators who stands as sponsors for this bill, in the feature to which reference is made, "it holds the word of promise to the ear to break it to the hope."

Mr. President, I know the exalted character of the purpose actuating Senators who champion this measure, and particularly of the Senator from Washington, to whose views I have ventured to refer, and the Senator from Tennessee, who speaks for the committee. To what extent the latter shares the views of the former that these grants ought to be perpetual I do not know.

The Senator from Washington argues that as the rates and service of the permittees are subject to regulation by either State or National authority, it is of no consequence how long the permit may run; in no case, he urges, can unreasonable or exorbitant charges be made without correction. But no answer has been made to the contention that permittees who use the power they develop, who do not become venders and distributors of power, who are not municipal bodies or subdivisions or public-utility corporations are not subject to regulation. Unquestionably permits will be taken out by manufacturers who will utilize the energy developed in adjacent works owned by them for the fixation of nitrogen, for the production of calcium carbide, for electrical smelting, for the operation of flour mills, pulp and paper, for the thousand and one purposes to which hydroelectric power is put in industry or will be put in the next half century. It is not contemplated by the bill that the price of the products so brought into being shall be subject to regulation of any kind. Indeed the bill expressly provides that when the power is to be employed for public-utility purposes, the permit can issue only to a municipality or a municipal subdivision or a corporation, subject to regulation in respect to the prices it shall charge. It is necessarily implied that permits shall issue when the power is to be put to private use to persons or corporations who will be subject in the conduct of their business, so far as prices are concerned, to no governmental control whatever. It is quite obvious from comment frequently made by the Senator from Tennessee that he, too, has been oblivious of this condition. In connection with a feature lately under consideration he argued that a monopoly—at least within a limited area, a "region"—was not to be dreaded since it was to be a regulated monopoly.

But even in the case of such of the power as is to be devoted to public-utility purposes the permits under which it is developed ought to be limited and not perpetual. The regulatory machinery of the States can not be said to be working with accuracy approaching perfection. It will be a difficult if not an impossible task to regulate prices so as to do equal and exact justice as between hydroelectric power and steam power competing in the same territory, and between rival water-power plants serving the same communities.

Notwithstanding public utilities serving cities are subject to regulation, municipalities are showing an increasing disposition to acquire and operate their own plants. Who will dare say that 50 years hence it will not be the common conviction of our people that municipal ownership is the true solution of the problem of furnishing water, light, heat, and power to the denizens of our cities and of transportation within them? Mr. President, I can not believe that the committee could have given to this subject the serious consideration to which its vast importance entitles it if its members quit the consideration of this bill with the conviction that the rights in the public to take over eventually the business that should be developed upon the franchise acquired from the public as its basis is of minor or trivial value.

Who is there with vision broad enough, with a prescience sufficiently penetrating, to measure the value that these resources will have 50 years hence?

Dismiss for the moment all thought of the use of the power except for industrial purposes and direct your minds to such as will then be utilized for private purposes, subject to no regulation in respect to the price at which the commodities produced through its agency may be sold. Look backward a half century to the year after the Civil War. Survey the progress of the world industrially since that time. Give rise to your imagination in an effort to comprehend the stage at which industrial development will have arrived 50 years hence, and then try to form some feeble notion of the value of the heritage you may leave to your children and your children's children in these exhaustless sources of power.

The States of Washington and Montana are exceptionally favored by nature in respect to opportunities for the development of hydroelectric power. Sites on which may be produced one-third of all the water power that can be generated by the falling water within continental United States are found within the two States named and the two neighboring States of Oregon and Idaho. Development has proceeded in that region with a rapidity unequaled in any part of the Union, barring California. Montana enjoys the distinction of having more developed water power per capita than any other State in this country and perhaps more than any nation, and there are sites yet available in that State over which the Federal Government may exercise control, in connection with which power may be generated to the amount of ten times the capacity of the plants in operation. Why should we pass those sites in perpetuity to private corporate interests or burden the recall of the permit to occupy them with conditions so onerous as to make it impossible to exercise the privilege?

Many there are who would prefer to see these sites developed and utilized as Government projects. It is idle to canvass at this time the wisdom of such a policy. The public mind is not open to such a purpose, the public purse is not equal to it, the business capacity of governmental agencies is not yet sufficiently developed to warrant entering upon it. But who shall say that 50 years hence States, counties, cities, irrigation districts may not be eager to secure many of the sites we propose now to pass into private ownership upon terms which, to say the least, offer very little inducement to the public to take them over? We tender them now by the bill under consideration to political subdivisions, imagining that some of them may care to avail themselves of the privilege extended. It is advanced as a special merit in the bill that it gives a preference to such applicants. Let us so write this bill that 50 years hence they may have another chance. As a contribution toward perfecting the bill in that respect, I tender the amendment read.

What does it mean, Mr. President? The bill provides that 50 years hence the Government, the State, the county, the city, or any other local authority so authorized by the Government of the United States may take over the property, paying the fair value of the same, but no value being allowed for the rights hereunder granted. What are the rights hereunder granted? The right hereunder granted is to occupy the navigable stream, and, if necessary, to occupy public lands in connection with this property. Nothing shall be allowed for them. But project yourselves 50 years forward, and the question arises as to what the State will have to pay if it desires to take over one of these properties; as to what a city will be obliged to pay if it wants to take over one of these properties. It must pay what is then the fair value.

Take the very land upon which the dam is erected upon both sides of the stream. That land will be valued according to its then value as a site for the erection of a power plant. In the meantime enormous cities will be built up about these plants. The property has no value whatever except as a dam site, and it has that value simply in connection with the use of the privilege that is to be exercised there.

Mr. President, I say you can not, as a practical proposition, sever from the value of that site the right which is granted by this bill to put the dam across the stream and to divert the waters for the purpose of developing power. Therefore you must not give to the power company the right to have the then value of that property as it shall be determined in the midst of conditions as they shall be 50 years hence. If you give these people the money that they put into it, give them back every dollar that they put in, what more can they ask, so far as the particular property is concerned that is acquired and developed in connection with the permit that you give them?

Of course, if the power company should go into a distant city and acquire a piece of property there, upon which they erected a public building six, seven, or eight stories in height, and occupied a portion of it, I should not say that they were not entitled to the benefit of their foresight and sagacity, and that they ought not to have the fair value of that property as it shall be 50 years hence. But you are going to permit the company to recover the value of the right that you grant them, if you give them the right to have the value as it then exists of the dam and the land upon both sides of the stream upon which the dam rests.

I submit that they get all they are entitled to if they get back the money that they actually put into it. Therefore my amendment provides that they shall get back every dollar that they put into the dam, every dollar they put into the land upon which the dam rests, every dollar that they put into their diversion works, every dollar they put into their distribution plant, but nothing more. The balance of it acquired its additional value by virtue of the right that we granted to them, and they ought not to have it back.

So, Mr. President, when they condemn public land for a right of way—take a transmission line, for instance; think of it, Mr. President—they come to the office of the Secretary of the Interior here, for instance, and get a right to occupy a portion of the public domain with their transmission line. Should they not have anything back for that? They go into the courts and exercise the right of eminent domain, and they are obliged to pay $10,000 for a right of way for their transmission line. When they take it over they ought to get that $10,000 back, but should they get the value of that right of way as it shall have accumulated in value after the lapse of 50 years and by the development of the country all around by the genius and enterprise of the men who built it up?

I insist that that is wrong. Whenever they seize hold of the governmental power in order to enable them to occupy any land they ought to be glad at the end of the 50 years' period to turn over that land, getting back every dollar that they put into it.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that we ought to encumber the privileges provided in the bill, and as a contribution at least toward making it a workable proposition I offer this amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to examine the amendment since the Senator from Montana offered it. I have a distinct recollection that when the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said that the bill practically gave a perpetual franchise I differed with him. I think it is a permit for 50 years which I favor and intended to so provide. I do it not from my personal knowledge of power development, but because that seems to be agreed upon by the companies who desire to make such developments, hydraulic and electric engineers, and investors who have testified upon the subject, and by the public officials who have made reports and also testified before committees concerning the matter. They all seem to be of the opinion that a 50-year period is fair to the company making the development and to the consumers, and I adopt their views. The bill is written with the intent of ending the permit at the end of 50 years, or such time as the Government may take it over, because the United States may not be prepared or desire to take it over at the expiration of the term. It may do so for 10 years after the permit expires, and, of course, the plant ought to be kept in operation until it does so. It would be deplorable if the plant should be shut down at the end of the permit, and all the manufacturing establishments built up around it and supplied with power by it would also have to shut down, which would be the case if there were not some provision for continuing it until it is taken over by the Government. I shall discuss those provisions at another time.

I understood the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to relate to the value of the property or the compensation which should be paid to the company constructing the improvement at the time it is taken over. I do not altogether understand that the amendment goes as far as the position assumed by the Senator in his argument. There was some confusion in the Chamber and I could not gather his position as accurately as I would desire. The amendment has not been printed, having been just offered. The Senator says it is the most vital amendment that has been presented to the bill. I therefore ask that it go over and be printed, to be considered after we have had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just in this connection I wish to say a word. It is clear to my mind, as I said the other day, that this is practically a perpetual franchise. I said it is so for all practical purposes. I did not base that upon the burdens placed upon it, but upon what the United States would have to do in order to take it over, because it must be noted that this section simply provides for taking over by the United States or a State. The section says if "at any time after the expiration," and so forth, and the giving "of one year's notice * * * upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part," there shall be paid a certain amount and certain contracts, and so forth, assumed. I do not believe that if a great dam is constructed and power works developed and transmission lines put in and manufacturing of all sorts established the United States will want to take it over, because if it does it has to assume the contracts, it has to carry them out, it has to go into the business, and until the United States is ready to do that it is not going to terminate the permits and take over the works.

This was the reason why I said that for practical purposes I thought this was a perpetual franchise. Of course, by the terms of the bill it can be terminated in 50 years by the United States, but I can hardly conceive of a case where the United States will want to take these things over and assume these contracts and carry them out.

It was simply on that basis I made the statement that I thought it was practically a perpetual franchise, not because of the burden imposed in the payment of costs for the work but because of the burden that would come from the character of business developed and the difficulty of the United States in carrying on that business. That was all I meant by that statement.

I have no objection to the amendment being passed over.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, my State is not directly affected in any way by this proposition, but the husbanding of these great resources of our country has been a very serious proposition in our land and it has been a particularly interesting proposition to me. I have given it very much attention during many years of my life. I have taken no part in this discussion, for I felt that it was most admirably taken care of and I could add little or nothing to it.

Personally I am in favor of settling all these controversies that, it seems to me, must forever arise as to the difference in prices that may occur in the development of water power or horsepower between one place and another, the differences that exist because of one having greater advantage than the other, and the efforts of utility commissions to harmonize them. My solution of this trouble is Government ownership, the Government construction of all the plants to aggregate and concentrate this power. I believe that not only with reference to water power, but I have believed it with reference to some of the other great utilities of our country. However, I realize that to urge it is almost to urge a heresy. It may be that the sentiments suggested by the Senator from Montana are utterly true under the conditions to-day. Mayhap the people of this country are not ready to go into this enterprise.

The argument, on the other hand, insisted upon by the proponents of this bill is that, if this action is not taken, water power will be going on as it has for a million years past, and it will be an absolute waste. We are not a Nation of people for to-day or for a hundred years. Better let it go to waste for a hundred years than to have it come in the grasp of a few cormorants, and thus shut out the future rights and privileges of the people.

I am earnestly in favor of Government construction and Government control of these great utilities as well as many others, but I shall not press that thought now. I am earnestly in favor of guarding and safeguarding and curtailing this great power in the hands of private corporations, and hence with all the earnestness of my nature I am advocating and standing by the propositions that have been made by the Senator from Montana, believing that that will, as near as we can just now, accomplish the results which we desired.

I hold in my hand a copy of the New York American dated Saturday last, which contains an article to which I desire to call attention. I imagine some will question it when I state the author. The author is Gifford Pinchot. It is on this very subject, setting forth, I think, in strong terms a sensible argument why it is wise that this bill should be defeated and the whole project end rather than have this great power so tied up in the grasp of private companies as to make it impossible for us in future years to utilize it.

I ask in connection with my remarks that this article of Gifford Pinchot, February 15, 1916, be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A PROTEST AGAINST THE SHIELDS AND FERRIS BILLS.

[By Gifford Pinchot.]

MILFORD, PIKE COUNTY, PA.,
February 15, 1916.

To the EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN:

SIR: I write to ask your help to defeat a most serious attack on our public resources. Since the fight over the Alaska resources was won there has not been so pressing a threat against the conservation policy as the present effort in Congress to give our public water powers for nothing into monopolistic control.

The Shields bill, now before the Senate, gives to the power interests without compensation the use of water power on navigable streams. The amount of water power these streams will supply is larger by far than all the power of every kind now in use in the United States.

It pretends to, but does not, enable the people to take back their own property at the end of 50 years, for in order to do so under the bill the Government would have to pay the unearned increment and to take over whole lighting systems of cities and whole manufacturing plants. Private corporations are authorized to seize upon any land, private or public, they choose to condemn.

Bills which give away public-water powers without due compensation were vetoed by President Roosevelt and President Taft. The Shields bill would do precisely the same thing to-day.

Another water-power bill, the Ferris bill, relating to the public lands and national forests, was in the main a good bill as it passed the House. As reported to the Senate it encourages monopoly by permitting a corporation to take as many public water-power sites as it may please.

Under it the corporations could not even be kept from fastening upon the Grand Canyon, the greatest natural wonder on this continent. This bill takes the care of water powers on national forests from the experienced and competent Forest Service and gives it to the Interior Department, thus entailing duplication and needless expense.

In my opinion there is undue carelessness as to the disposal of public resources at present in Washington. The water-power legislation now before the Senate is too favorable to the men who, as Secretary Houston's admirable recent report shows, control through 18 corporations more than one-half of the total water power used in public service throughout the United States.

The water-power men charge that conservation hampers development. The Houston report shows, on the contrary, that the most rapid development is in the national forests, where conservation is best enforced. On the other hand, 120 public-service corporations own and are holding undeveloped and out of use an amount of water power equal to four-fifths of all there is developed and in use by all the public-service corporations in the whole United States.

As I said in an open letter of January 29 to the President:

"Natural resources lie at the foundation of all preparedness, whether for peace or for war. No plan for national defense can be effective unless it provides for adequate public control of all the raw materials out of which the defensive strength of a nation is made. Of these raw materials water power is the most essential, because without electricity generated from water power we can not manufacture nitrates, and nitrates are the basis of gunpowder. There are no great natural deposits of nitrates in the United States as there are in Chile. It would be folly to allow the public water powers, which can supply this indispensable basis of national defense to pass out of effective public control."

A concerted movement is on foot to break down the conservation policy. Feeble resistance or none at all is being made by official Washington. Unless the press and the people come to the rescue the power interests are likely to win.

This is a public matter wholly removed from political partisanship. Your help is needed, and that of your paper. For nearly 10 years this fight for the public water powers has gone on. We ought not to lose it now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just in this connection I shall ask to have a letter read in the RECORD. I noticed some time ago that Mr. Pinchot had written a letter to the President protesting against not only this bill but the bill reported from the Public Land Committee. The letter purported to be written by him on behalf of the National Conservation Association. I have a great deal of admiration for Mr. Pinchot. I remember that when he was in the Forestry Service my relations with him were very pleasant and I found him very reasonable in connection with matters coming before him. I have great respect for his judgment in reference to conservation matters, although I do not agree with him in many particulars.

I will say that I did not know that there are two or three different conservation organizations. I had noticed at various times the proceedings of what I thought was the National Conservation Congress, and I supposed it was the organization Mr. Pinchot represented, and that the National Conservation Congress and the National Conservation Association are the same. I learned a short time ago that there was an executive committee of what is known as the National Conservation Congress meeting here, and I inquired of some of them whether this was the same organization as that Mr. Pinchot was purporting to speak for. I was informed that it was not. It may be I ought to have known that, but I did not; and I am satisfied a great many people of the country do not understand that the National Conservation Congress and the National Conservation Association are different organizations. A few days after that I received a letter from Mr. G. E. Condra, chairman of the executive committee of the National Conservation Congress, which I ask may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 11, 1916.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your request for information concerning a letter which Mr. Gifford Pinchot is reported to have forwarded to his excellency, the President of the United States, and in which he is said to represent the conservation movement, including the National Conservation Congress, I will say that as chairman of the executive committee of the National Conservation Congress, I do not know of a time when we have authorized any member of our committee to write the President of our country, or to write anyone else, concerning the attitude which we assume, or should assume, in legislative matters. We are actively engaged in the practical affairs of conservation, having in view the fullest development of resources, with the minimum of wastage.

Of course you know that there are many departments of conservation and that the individual who develops his own interests to the fullest extent is practicing personal conservation. In national conservation we develop the resources for the largest public good.

There are a number of conservation organizations, both State and National. The National Association of Conservation Commissioners is an organization of men connected with State departments, engaged in work relating to State development.

The Conservation Association, of which Mr. Pinchot is president, seems to exist for the purpose of watching legislation. Just how far Mr. Pinchot has succeeded in this, and just who are members of his association, I am not in a position to state.

The National Conservation Congress is the largest organization of the kind in the country. Its membership includes many men of Federal, State, and educational departments, and representatives of the leading industries of our country. It is an open forum for the discussion of conservation problems. Its purpose is to gather accurate information concerning resources and industries, and to make such recommendations for their development as will conserve national strength and efficiency. There are a number of committees in this congress, each composed of men, or of men and women, having technical and practical knowledge. The committees prepare and present reports to the congress for open discussion. The resolutions following the reports are either passed or rejected. The results of these deliberations are printed.

The congress, as such, does not in any way assume to either further or dictate in legislative matters. This more properly belongs to the legislative departments.

We have held a meeting of the executive committee of the National Conservation Congress in Washington this week. Without opposition, the subject "Conservation of national strength and efficiency" was decided upon for the next session of the congress which is to be held here May 2, 3, and 4. It is our purpose to enlist the service of technical thought in reports which will be brought before the session. Each principal material resource is being investigated by a competent committee. More than 300 persons are working on the various committees.

The program of the congress will be forwarded your office as soon as it is received from the printers.

Assuring you that the National Conservation Congress, as now constituted, is not engaged in politics and that no one has been authorized to influence legislation, I am

Very truly, yours,

G. E. CONDRA,
Chairman Executive Committee National Conservation Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Montana. I have read it over hurriedly, and, while I do not say now that I am in favor of it, I will say that it seems to me it is pretty fair. I do not see anything especially wrong about it. I am sure that I do not want to impose any greater burdens on the taking over of this property than will treat those who invest their money fairly and justly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question in regard to this letter.

Mr. JONES. All right.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator from Nebraska defer a moment? I should like to say to the Senator from Washington, because I know he will appreciate the point, that I do not want water rights, the right arising from the appropriation of water, to be valued upon the basis of conditions 50 years hence, but want to insure to the investor the return of whatever money he was obliged to expend to acquire such rights.

Mr. JONES. I am inclined to think so. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield, I wish to understand the amendment before it goes over under my request.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that. I was trying to ask a question about something that was directly before the Senate and which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] had read, namely, the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the amendment going over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to have the order made disposing of my request.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] can withdraw his amendment and say that he will offer it to-morrow. I have not looked at the amendment, and I should like to see it in print.

Mr. WALSH. I am entirely agreeable to the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], to have the matter continued and to let the amendment lie over.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let the amendment be printed. It is not necessary to withdraw it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do this because I want to get the matter fairly before the Senate, and I know the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has no other desire. Of course, I never saw the letter which the Senator has read, but in listening to it I take it that the writer rather assumes that Mr. Pinchot had represented himself in his letter to the President as writing on behalf of the Conservation Congress.

Mr. JONES. No; Mr. Pinchot does not assume that.

Mr. NORRIS. I gathered that from the reading of the letter. I thought the Senator from Washington had ascribed that motive to Mr. Pinchot.

Mr. JONES. No. I will say to the Senator, as I thought I said at the start, that I simply understood there were some of the gentlemen of the National Conservation Congress here, and I myself supposed that Mr. Pinchot's letter was on behalf of the National Conservation Congress. I did not know that there were two organizations. I spoke to the writer of this letter with reference to the matter, and he told me of the two different organizations, and said he would write me a letter with reference to that matter. So that if there was any idea conveyed that Mr. Pinchot ever sought to represent the Conservation Congress, it came from me rather than from this gentleman here, because of my lack of understanding with reference to the two organizations. I simply want to make it clear, that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I want to make is that Mr. Pinchot in his letter does not pretend, of course, to represent the Conservation Congress, and the letter itself shows on its face that he wrote it in behalf of the National Conservation Association.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. And I did not want anyone to get the idea that there was any other intention, so far as the letter itself is concerned. It shows on its face what it does and whom Mr. Pinchot represents.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Washington whether this Conservation Congress has either expressed any opinion or whether it expects to express any opinion, or does this letter express any opinion as to the merits of this bill?

Mr. JONES. Of course, the letter speaks for itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I thought the letter intimated that there was some understanding that Mr. Pinchot had undertaken to represent that congress; but it seems I was mistaken in that.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I never read the letter; I never have seen it; but I have now heard it read. If I was mistaken on that point, I might be mistaken as to another. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington, Does the letter give us any advice?

Mr. JONES. It does not.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not take any sides on this question?

Mr. JONES. It does not. It does not express any views with reference to pending legislation at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand, the only object in reading the letter was to show that Mr. Pinchot did not represent that congress, and Mr. Pinchot's letter already showed that.

Mr. JONES. The sole purpose was to make clear that the National Conservation Association and the National Conservation Congress are different organizations; that was all.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think, in this connection, it would be well to read a statement which I find on page 23 of the report made by a committee of the Fifth National Conservation Congress upon the subject of water-power development. This report was made by George F. Swain, Lewis B. Stillwell, M. O. Leighton, Edwin S. Webster, and B. M. Hall, all gentlemen prominent in conservation matters. The portion I shall read is in these words:

> Finally, we repeat that for the conservation of our water powers it is essential that capital shall be attracted to these enterprises, and while we must, of course, fully protect the interest of the public, both present and future, we are not conservationists if we advocate the imposition of terms which restrict rather than encourage development. We must also remember that under present conditions water-power investments are not especially attractive, and that steam power is a more desirable form of power, since it can be located wherever needed and the supply regulated according to demand. Water power is more variable, and, furthermore, it requires in general a very much larger investment per horsepower than steam, though its running expenses are less. Because of the large first cost of water-power developments the risk of loss in case of failure of the enterprise is correspondingly large. Capital therefore does not need water-power enterprises, and it will not take them up to any considerable degree unless fully protected.
> It is from a point of view of pure conservation that the development of water power is most important.
> It has been estimated that we use annually over 480,000,000 tons of coal, worth nearly a billion dollars, in addition to many millions dollars' worth of other fuels; and that some $200,000,000 worth of this fuel annually might perhaps be saved by the utilization of water powers. When we consider also that the development of water power not only conserves fuel but directly serves to promote the navigability of rivers, we should be very careful how we discourage this triple conservation in order to secure other results which we may consider desirable. If we do discourage it we may be antimonopolists, or something else, but we are certainly not conservationists.

I read that in connection with the letter presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to show what are the views of the Conservation Congress upon the subject.

In regard to the communication of Mr. Gifford Pinchot to the New York American, presented by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], I wish to say I have had no opportunity to read it. I had not seen it before it was presented, and I do not know what the editorial contains. I see it refers to an open letter that Mr. Pinchot wrote the President, and I suppose the communication read is substantially the general circular letter that this gentleman has sent out to all the newspapers, dailies and weeklies, as I understand, in the United States. I have understood that this letter, prepared by him and sent to the President, was offered to the press associations and declined by them, and therefore he had to resort to this circular for publicity in the press of the country, and doubtless this is the same letter.

I got my information of this circular letter from the editors of numerous newspapers in Tennessee, who sent the circular to me so that I might be apprized of what was being done. The press of Tennessee, of course, is deeply interested in the development of the natural resources of that State, and does not approve of any policy such as that advocated by Mr. Pinchot—to lock them up and prevent the people of this generation from having the benefit of them because he sees the ghost of a probable monopoly.

That is all I have to say about Mr. Pinchot at this time. I know that he held a subordinate position in the Agricultural Department at the time of the Ballinger investigation, and by fortuitous circumstances acquired some publicity in connection with the natural resources of the country; and I understand, from such publications as this, that he has been attempting to keep in the limelight and by assailing both this bill and that known as the Ferris bill, which passed the House and has been reported, with some amendments, for passage by the Senate, for the development of water power on the public lands.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator from Tennessee had concluded.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to take the floor in my own right, Mr. President. I have no interest in Mr. Pinchot or in the Conservation Association or in the Conservation Congress; I have no brief to speak for any of them, and I speak now only because it seems to me that, in justice, somebody ought to put into the RECORD the letter to the President which has been so often referred to. Before I do that I want to pause for a moment to say that just the other day—Friday or Saturday last—the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] in charge of this bill, in arguing a proposition which he favored and considering that the opinion of Mr. Pinchot might be of value in its support, read at length from one of the hearings of a committee before which Mr. Pinchot testified. There was nothing said at that time about his being a man who had held "a subordinate position in the Agricultural Department," and who ever since he had been discharged "has been trying to keep himself in the limelight." It was considered a good argument then to quote from him, and it was thought that there was good reason for so doing, because it happened to subserve the purpose of the moment and because the views of Mr. Pinchot agreed with those of the Senator in the particular proposition he was advocating. At the same time the Senator read from the testimony of ex-Secretary Fisher, who occupied a position that was not subordinate in the Interior Department, but who is no longer in an official position.

I have often heard—I have heard them several times during the discussion of this bill—references made to Mr. Pinchot which were not intended to be in his praise, which in various ways were rather belittling to him and to his efforts and to his work. What the Senator from Tennessee has said has been perfectly parliamentary and, of course, perfectly gentlemanly, and I am not complaining of it; but there have been other references made concerning Mr. Pinchot of a rather disparaging nature. It is hardly fair, it seems to me, in the discussion of a great bill like this, where the policy of a great Government is at stake, to bolster up your cause one day by citing Gifford Pinchot and the next day, when he does not agree with you, to speak of him as a man who is probably hardly known anywhere, but who used to hold "a subordinate position in the Agricultural Department" and was finally discharged.

Everybody knows, whether or not he agrees with Mr. Pinchot—and I do not always agree with him—that Gifford Pinchot is one of the leading authorities in the United States, and, indeed, in the world, upon all questions of conservation. He is amply able to take care of himself, and take care of the ideas in which he believes.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] thought it of sufficient importance this morning to have read at the Secretary's desk a letter from the chairman of the executive committee of the National Conservation Congress, which, although it was composed of several pages, had no other idea on earth in it except to show that Gifford Pinchot did not represent the National Conservation Congress. The letter expressed no opinion about this legislation, but devoted its entire attention to the effort—and there was no other object in it—to show that Gifford Pinchot did not represent the Conservation Congress. That communication made reference to a letter which Gifford Pinchot wrote to the President. That letter on its face shows that Gifford Pinchot did not even pretend to represent the Conservation Congress, and did not even mention it. Inasmuch as it has been thought wise to take up the time of this body to have read a letter several pages in length to show that this man, who occupied an inferior position in the Agricultural Department and has since been discharged but who is trying to keep in the limelight, did not represent the Conservation Congress, it seems to me but fair that his letter, to which reference has been made, should be read from the Secretary's desk; and in a few moments I am going to ask that the Secretary read that letter, so that it may be printed in the RECORD and show for itself what it is and what it pretends to be.

Why, Mr. President, when Mr. Pinchot occupied that position, that subordinate position, in the Agricultural Department the country knew at the time of his discharge upon what grounds he was discharged. The whole country was aroused, and it was considered of such importance that the Secretary of the Interior, who had been instrumental in bringing about his discharge, had secured the introduction in the Senate and in the other House of a joint resolution providing for an investigation. When that joint resolution came up in the House it was modified by an amendment offered and advocated by the so-called "insurgents" of the House. By a simple amendment they provided that the House members of the investigating committee, instead of being appointed by the Speaker, should be elected by the House. That simple amendment created great excitement, because, as a matter of fact, although it was made up of but few words, it revolutionized the entire investigation. The white wash which had been prepared and the white-wash brushes which had already been put into the hands of the proper persons immediately became of no value, and instead of having a white-washing committee we had a real, genuine investigation, the committee sitting in the city of Washington for months taking testimony. That investigation attracted the attention of everyone all over the United States—all on account of this man "occupying an inferior position in the Agricultural Department, from which he has been discharged."

I am not complaining of the man who does not agree with his policies. I have just as much respect for him as I have for those who do agree with Mr. Pinchot. They have a right to their judgment and a right to their opinions; but if we want to be fair, Mr. President, then it seems to me we ought to concede at least honesty of purpose to this great man, because I think in candor we ought to call him such, for he is a leader in public thought in the entire civilized world on the question of conservation. He may sometimes be wrong, but he has shown, and given ample evidence of the fact, that his zeal is not brought about because of any selfish purpose. Without drawing any salary, without occupying any official position, he has still been able to convince a very large percentage of the people of the country that his ideas of conservation are right. So I think we ought to recognize that this great question has two sides to it.

I want to cast no reflection upon the man who thinks that we ought to have our streams developed by corporations without their paying anything and without any regulatory string tied to the undertaking, simply because by their development we will have navigable streams made more navigable. Men believe that, and believe it honestly, and think that is sufficient compensation, but they have not a mortgage on all the patriotism, on all the honesty, or even upon all the wisdom of the country. There are men, like Gifford Pinchot, who honestly believe this bill is wrong; and, without casting any reflection upon those who think it is perfect, the others have a right to be heard. If it was necessary to take up the time of the Senate to read a letter which has for its foundation and its only purpose to show that Gifford Pinchot, in his letter to the President of the United States, did not represent the Conservation Congress, it seems to me that the very fact that that letter was read, unless it is contradicted here and now, will have a tendency—and there can be no other result, and I clearly will relieve my friend the Senator from Washington from any ulterior motive; I know he would not think of such a thing for a moment—to cause it to be said, "Here is a letter referred to, not produced, written to the President, and here comes another letter from a great national organization saying that the man who wrote that other letter did not represent this congress."

I therefore ask the Secretary to read, in my time, the letter written by Gifford Pinchot to the President to which reference has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done.

The Secretary read as follows:

OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES BY GIFFORD PINCHOT, CONCERNING THE WATER-POWER SITUATION IN CONGRESS, ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL CONSERVATION ASSOCIATION.

JANUARY 29, 1916.

The PRESIDENT,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing on behalf of the National Conservation Association to call your attention to the threat against the public welfare presented by the water-power situation in Congress. This threat is so pressing and the certain consequence of failure to meet it so disastrous that it deserves your consideration and that of the whole people of the United States. In defense of the general interest, therefore, I shall take the liberty of making this letter public.

There is a bill on the Calendar of the Senate whose passage would be a public misfortune. It is the Shields bill for the disposal of water power on navigable streams. The great water-power interests are behind it and an effort to pass it is to be made next week.

This is the second time the Shields bill has been reported in the Senate. Last year the friends of conservation were able to prevent its passage. This year, thanks to a skillful and elaborate campaign conducted by the water-power interests, there is grave danger that it will pass.

The Shields bill gives the use of enormously valuable public property to the water-power interests without compensation. Ostensibly it provides for a method of restoring its own property to the public at the end of 50 years. As a matter of fact, it has been so drawn as to make it practically impossible for the people to take their own water powers back into their hands. This it does by opening the way for indefinite litigation, and by the use of language under which the United States might be required to take over and pay for the whole electric-lighting systems of cities or the whole equipment of manufacturing plants in order to get possession again of water powers owned by the people.

The bill interposes every possible legal delay between the violator of a Government permit and the chance of effective enforcement. It fails to require the necessary publicity and uniformity of accounts, and so makes the effective supervision of water-power corporations impossible.

The Shields bill gives to the water-power interests the right to condemn or take any land they choose, public or private—rights which they should never have, but which should be exercised when required for water-power development either by the States or the National Government. It forces the people, when they take back the public property whose use they have granted, to pay the unearned increment on land condemned or otherwise acquired by the grantee. In not a few of its provisions the actual form of words prepared by the representatives of the water-power interests have been incorporated.

These are by no means all of its defects, but they will suffice to make it plain that the Shields bill has been astutely drawn for the benefit of the water-power interests, and ought not to pass.

This is a public matter wholly removed from partisanship. You yourself have taken strong ground against the grabbing of our natural resources, of which none is more valuable in peace or war than water power. President Roosevelt vetoed the James River bill in 1909 and President Taft vetoed the Coosa River bill in 1911 because they gave away the public property for nothing. That is precisely what the Shields bill would do to-day.

Natural resources lie at the foundation of all preparedness, whether for peace or for war. No plan for national defense can be effective unless it provides for adequate public control of the raw materials out of which the defensive strength of a nation is made. Of these raw materials water power is the most essential, because without electricity generated from water power we can not manufacture nitrates, and nitrates are the basis of gunpowder. There are no great natural deposits of nitrates in the United States, as there are in Chile. If we are to depend upon ourselves for our supplies, as we should, we must be prepared to produce our nitrates electrically from the air.

It would be folly to allow the public water powers, which can supply the indispensable basis of national defense, to pass out of effective public control. In the light of recent events, it would be especially shortsighted not to provide for the manufacture of nitrates and other munitions by means of the public water powers, if necessary in the event of war. The terms and conditions under which this could be done should be so fixed in advance as to forbid private greed to profit unduly from the public necessity. Under the law in France a man was recently charged with that specific offense, found guilty, and sent to prison.

There is another bill before the Senate to which I desire to call your attention. This is the Ferris bill for the control of water power on the public lands and national forests. The Ferris bill, in the form in which it passed the House, is in accord with the principles of conservation. As it has been reported to the Senate, it contains indefensible changes. It actually encourages monopoly by compelling the Secretary of the Interior to grant forthwith to any corporation all the power sites it may choose to ask for. Under it power corporations could seize upon any part they choose of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, a natural wonder far greater than Niagara, and no one could stop them. These are but two of its faults.

The Senate form of the Ferris bill should be killed, and the House form should pass, after it has been amended into conformity with the public interest, and so that it will no longer take the care of water powers on the national forests away from the experienced and competent Forest Service, where it now lies. The Ferris bill has already twice passed the House. It already has your indorsement, but without the active support of the administration it will fail.

For every reason of national prosperity and national defense the development of our water powers is desirable. But the claim of the water-power interests that free gifts of public property to themselves are needed to promote development is false. It is disproved, officially and finally, by Secretary Houston's recent report on water power, the most searching and exhaustive ever made. The Houston report shows that where the public interest has been most carefully protected, on the national forests, their development has been most rapid, and the largest ratio of increase in capital invested has taken place.

More than half of the water power developed in the West is on the public lands and the national forests. In the 11 Western States water-power development from 1902 to 1912 was nearly five times as rapid as in the rest of the country, and since 1912 the annual increase is greater than ever. In California, which has the largest area of national forests, and in Oregon and Washington, development has gone on until it is now actually in excess of market requirements. It is clearly evident that fair Government regulation does not hamper development and use. No farmer, for example, will be deprived of nitrate fertilizer at a fair price, because of reasonable Government control of public water powers.

I have ventured by this letter to call your special attention to the fact that the public interest in the public water powers is in danger. To set that danger aside, your opposition to the Shields bill, and your support of the Ferris bill, properly amended in the Senate, are vitally needed. I need hardly add they will be vigorously seconded by the National Conservation Association, which, under every administration since it was founded, has supported the officers of our Government in every effort they have made to promote the public welfare through the conservation of natural resources.

Yours, respectfully, GIFFORD PINCHOT.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with the subject matter that was just presented and touching the publicity bureau that has been established in Washington for the purpose of spreading broadcast throughout the country the theories stated in the letter just read, I have been handed an extract from a paper by Mr. George L. Walker, in which he refers to the personal letters to editors by Mr. Pinchot, and then comments upon the advantages and disadvantages of the development of water power in this country.

I do not desire in any way to stand sponsor for a few personal references in the article to Gifford Pinchot, but I simply desire to have the article published in the RECORD at this time for the purpose of giving the views of Mr. George L. Walker as to the position that the people of the West find themselves in at present in relation to the further development of water power. I shall not take the time of the Senate to have it read, but I will ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Boston Commercial of Feb. 19, 1916.]

DEVELOPMENT REAL CONSERVATION—THE FOLLY OF WITHHOLDING WATER POWER FROM PUBLIC USE—AMPLE COMPENSATION IN SERVICE AND TAXES.

Gifford Pinchot, who came prominently into the public eye several years ago as one of the foremost advocates of conservation, apparently has not awakened to the fact that the American people have debated that question in their minds until they are satisfied that it is simply the crazy idea of an illogical dreamer. He is now writing personal letters to editors, asking the press to help him "defeat a most serious attack upon our public resources." He says the Shields bill, now before the Senate, gives to the "power interests" without compensation the use of water power on navigable streams; that the amount of power these streams will supply is larger by far than all the power of every kind now in use in the United States; and then he rambles on about provisions which should "enable the people to take back their own property at the end of 50 years."

Mr. Pinchot is a Socialist, though he probably does not know it, and it is altogether improbable that the Socialists would accept him as such. His idea, reduced to its final analysis, is that the whole people should own everything and that the lazy and improvident, through the mere mistake of birth, should inherit a share of the accumulations of the creative, the industrious, and the thrifty. It seems to be his opinion that one method to bring about his desired distribution of wealth would be to hold up those who finance and develop industries and make them pay the Government for the privilege of doing business. John Ruskin objected to steam railroad building in England because, in his opinion, it would deface the scenery. Gifford Pinchot is afraid some one might develop water power in "the Grand Canyon, the greatest natural wonder on this continent." Therefore Pinchot is in no sense original.

If the savings of thrifty people had not been put into corporations to build up the railroads, probably no one would now take as a gift either the water powers or the great agricultural areas of the interior of this country there would not be taxable property enough in the United States to pay the salaries of the little group of muckrakers who still hold public office, and the relatively small area from which food products could be moved to seaboard would not support one-half of the present population. Everybody knows, possibly excepting Pinchot, that the development of the country's water powers will result in the creation of property values and that the taxes the holders of such properties will pay will compensate the Government handsomely. They also know that by the use of this power the productive capacity of the country will be immensely increased, giving remunerative employment to labor and exerting an influence to reduce the cost of living. It is common knowledge also that the entire material progress of humanity has been due to the development and use of natural resources by the people who save, invest, and work, and who do not permit themselves to be restrained from doing so by impracticable theories.

If this country is to go ahead industrially, an immense amount of mechanical power must be developed. Is it better that the coal deposits or the waterfalls should be conserved? One or the other must furnish the power.

Mr. Pinchot thought the coal measures of Alaska should be conserved, also the forests, and now the water powers. The rest of us in the United States do not agree with him fully, and therefore it would seem to be up to him to remove his place of residence to the interior of South America or Africa, where everything is being conserved.

If there is anyone left who has the courage to invest his capital in the development and equipment of a water power in the United States, after the way the Government has treated investors during the past eight or nine years he should be given the privilege of doing so, and he should also be awarded a medal for bravery.

That water powers or anything else should be operated at cost for the alleged "benefit of the people" is a figment of the imagination. Profits are just as essential to industrial and material progress as food is to a growing child.

If the full product of industry were divided equally among those who take part in its production there would be no fund with which to build for the future. Until there is a sufficient accumulation to pay for clearing the land, providing the seed and cultivating the plants, there can be no harvest, and a part of each crop must be saved for seed and to feed the workers until harvest time the following year.

Undoubtedly a few editors will fall for Mr. Pinchot's argument; but it is believed that a vast majority of them know better. The population of the United States is increasing and the only way to provide the growing numbers of people with food, raiment, and shelter is by the development of the country's natural resources, the extension of its industries, and the continuing increase of its production.

A relatively small portion of the profits of industry is wasted by the rich on luxuries and extravagances; but more than three-quarters of all net earnings are reinvested and the profits thereon reinvested in such a way that the public gets the full benefit to the last dollar.

Fortunately, approximately all of the profits so far made in this country have been invested at home. After they begin to be invested abroad, the people of other countries will get the benefit of them. If Gifford Pinchot's dreams are permitted to come true, American capital will go abroad in shiploads.

The old song says, "The mill will never grind again with the waters that are past." The only way to conserve water power is by developing and using it. By this method the millions of horsepower now running to waste every day should be conserved, Mr. Pinchot to the contrary notwithstanding.

GEORGE L. WALKER.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to be inserted after the word "and," in line 9, page 11, as follows:

Whenever the States directly concerned are unable to agree, through the properly constituted authorities thereof, on either rates, charges, or services.

I am disposed to believe that the Senator from Tennessee would be very glad to accede to this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator restate his amendment? I did not have the bill in my hand at the time.

Mr. WALSH. After the first word "and," in line 9, page 11, I move to insert——

Mr. SHAFROTH. What page and line, please?

Mr. WALSH. Page 11, line 9, after the word "and" where it first occurs in the line, I move to insert the following words:

Whenever the States directly concerned are unable to agree, through the properly constituted authorities thereof, on either rates, charges, or services.

The purport of the amendment is this: The act provides that the rates, charges, and services shall be regulated in each State by the authorities thereof, so far as the intrastate business is concerned. If the business is interstate, it shall be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. My idea of the matter is—and I invite the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to this particular matter—that the Federal authorities ought not to be burdened with the duty or the obligation of fixing rates in regard to interstate business unless in the event that the authorities of the States concerned are unable to agree.

To illustrate, power is now being developed at Thompson, in my State, and carried from there to the Coeur d'Alenes, in the State of Idaho. Of course, there must be some regulatory authority. The company would find it difficult to do business if it had to submit to regulation by these two States, their regulations being possibly conflicting, or at least divergent. The act contemplates that in a case of that kind the regulation must be by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but I would not do that if the authorities of the two States could agree upon it. In all reasonable probability they could. That is to say, if the regulatory authority of the State of Montana and the regulatory authority of the State of Idaho got together, they could agree upon the rates.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator this thought: I can easily see where there is a good deal of merit in the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, if it is provided that where the utility commissions of the two States can not agree this shall be done.

Mr. WALSH. That was my idea.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me read the entire section, because I have never seen this amendment before:

That whenever all or any part of the power produced at any dam or diversion structure authorized hereunder is offered or disposed of by the grantee to the public, or for a public-utility purpose, all charges, rates, and service by any grantee hereunder shall be subject to regulation in accordance with the laws of the State within which the service is rendered: Provided, That where the said power or any part of it shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce the rates, charges, and services made and rendered shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and adequate to the public; and—

Now, here comes in the Senator's amendment, as I understand:

Whenever the States directly concerned are unable to agree, through the properly constituted authorities thereof, on either rates, charges, or services, jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon and vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce this provision, upon the complaint of any person aggrieved, or upon its own initiative, in the manner——

Mr. WALSH. We have not reached that yet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; we have not yet reached the second amendment.

I do not see any objection to that amendment, Mr. President; but I should prefer that the Senator withhold it until the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] returns. It seems to me that limits the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in cases where probably it ought to be limited, by reason of the fact that if they agree it seems to me it should be a matter of State control. If they do not agree it seems to me it ought to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Montana. I should like to know why this provision is necessary at all? The telephone service is a transmission of intelligence by the electric current. The electric current transported from one State to another is used at the point of transportation, just as any other element of manufacture would be. We have never had any trouble whatever in regard to telephone rates, although companies exist which cover several States.

For instance, the Mountain States Telephone Co. is a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone or American Telephone Co., and covers, among others, the States of Montana, Colorado, and Utah. It never has been suggested, so far as I know, that because the headquarters of that company are in the city of Denver, and I think it does its principal business there—I mean, its ordinary detail business; its office business—it is necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Utilities Commission of Utah to fix the price of messages received and delivered in the State of Utah or in the State of Montana; and I see no difference between that situation and the ones presented by this bill. It makes no difference, to my mind, where the power is generated and the price fixed either at the place where it is to be used or the place where it is generated. It would be just as pertinent to provide that in the event coal is mined in the State of Colorado and used in the State of Montana, and the price is not satisfactory, some commission should be established, because of the fact that the coal is transported from one place to another, as a sort of arbiter or final determiner of the controversy that might arise concerning it. It is not a matter which requires, in my judgment, any provision at all. It will take care of itself, and I think it can safely be left out of the bill in whatever form it is passed.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Colorado is addressing his remarks to the bill, not to my amendment. The bill provides for the regulation of this charge.

Mr. THOMAS. I am aware of that. I made the suggestion while on the floor some time ago that the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana gave me the opportunity to call attention to the subject.

Mr. WALSH. If the authority is objectionable, my amendment will make it less so because it will diminish the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. But, Mr. President, I do not think the bill will be complete without a provision similar in character to that found in the bill. It is true, as the Senator suggests, that a telephone company does business in half a dozen different States and it has not been found necessary so far to repose in any Federal authority power to regulate rates. But that is because the States have not attempted to make regulatory rates which are contradictory. Indeed I imagine that but few of them have undertaken to regulate telephone rates at all. However, when it comes to the furnishing of power I apprehend that in a very few years at least rather an effective regulation will be undertaken by quite a good many of the States, and the Senator can very readily see that if one regulation obtains in one State and another in another it would be difficult, if possible at all, to conduct the business.

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that personally I do not see any special objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. I know the Senator who has charge of the bill has known of the amendment and has given it some thought. I have not heard him express himself upon it, and as he has been called out of the Chamber for a moment for some reason and there are very few Senators here, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hollis	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	Hughes	Norris	Sterling
Catron	Husting	Oliver	Sutherland
Chamberlain	James	Overman	Thomas
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Thompson
Clapp	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Poindexter	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Pomerene	Underwood
Cummins	Lewis	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Lippitt	Shafroth	Walsh
du Pont	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	McCumber	Shields	Williams
Gronna	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Works

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana is unobjectionable to me, only I would suggest that he insert after the word "the" the words "public service commission of the State and."

Mr. WALSH. I think that is reached by the latter language in the amendment. I intended it should be so, because it reads:

Whenever the States directly concerned are unable to agree through the properly constituted authorities thereof.

Some States have commissions, other States have boards, and other States have reposed this authority in specific officers. My idea was that whatever State officer or State authority is vested with power should negotiate on behalf of the State.

Mr. SHIELDS. The idea of the Senator is correct, but I think it would be more definite to directly repose the authority to regulate rates in the public service commissions of the several States.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will consent to the amendment, I will be very glad to confer with him about redrafting it. Our ideas about it are apparently the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROUSSARD in the chair). The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 9, after the word "and" where it first appears insert:

Whenever the States directly concerned are unable to agree through the properly constituted authorities thereof on either rates, charges, or services.

Mr. SHIELDS. With the understanding suggested by the Senator from Montana, I will offer no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. There being now a quorum, as shown by the call just made, I ask unanimous consent that all amendments and the bill be voted on by 5 o'clock to-morrow, Tuesday, February 28.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that under the rule it will be necessary to call for a quorum again. The quorum has disappeared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of no quorum is made. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask first whether there is any objection to fixing a time to vote.

Mr. WORKS. I object to fixing a time at that hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then it will be unnecessary to consume the time of the Senate in calling the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I simply wished to express the desire of the committee having charge of the bill to dispose of it, and their readiness to dispose of all amendments offered within the time I have indicated.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I did not intend to take part in this discussion, but some of the arguments that were injected into the debate last Saturday and this morning in opposition to the pending bill persuade me to put into the RECORD a few of the many reasons that induce me to favor it.

We are all opposed to monopoly. We are opposed to monopoly because it is right that we should be. It is also popular to oppose monopoly, but, of course, no Senator will let this fact control his action. But opposition to monopoly is so very righteous and so very popular that we are invited to look with suspicion upon any legislation which will permit an American citizen to make 10 blades or 10,000 blades of grass grow where nothing is growing now. I think we should be careful not to go to extremes. In our effort to punish monopolies we should be very careful not to punish everybody. It is one of the weaknesses of a democracy that it is very apt to act in emergencies only.

First, conservatives, in their loyalty to the dogma that that government is best which governs least, permit abuses to arise. An evil becomes unbearable and the people rally around those who promise relief. The dogma that that government is best which governs most is hailed as the only true political religion. Folly in one extreme succeeds folly in another extreme. The innocent are punished with the guilty and legitimate opportunity is denied honest men, and, unlike the pendulum in a clock, the political pendulum does not complete its oscillation in one and the same length of time. The political pendulum swings to its extreme limit and sticks. Progress stops, time does not. It seems to me that we are facing precisely that condition at present in this country. President Wilson tells us in one of his messages that Congress has locked up the undeveloped water powers of the country. We have locked up the inexhaustible sources of power because we are afraid that when developed they will be monopolized, and because we can not agree as to which sovereignty—State or Federal—shall restrain, control, and tax water-power companies. To my mind this means great and irreparable loss to the people of this country if it is continued.

The prices of the exhaustible sources of power are rapidly increasing and the supply is diminishing. I do not need to bring statistics to prove the truth of this statement. We destroyed the oil monopoly, and the price of oil has been going up ever since. We broke up the combinations in control of coal, and the price of coal has been advancing ever since. I do not undertake to say why this is so. I merely state a well-known fact, and I think it is a very important fact. I am sure that the gentlemen who oppose this bill are ardent and earnest conservationists and antimonopolists, and it is precisely because I agree with their motives that I am opposed to their amendments. I believe that the people of this country are more deeply interested in the price of coal and oil than they are in the respective merits of Federal and State control over dams that do not exist and will not exist until some legislation is enacted that will permit American citizens to develop the undeveloped sources of hydroelectric power at a fair profit.

For instance, six years ago a Connecticut company came to Congress to get permission to build a dam across the Connecticut River within a stone's throw of Hartford. It was a 30,000-horsepower proposition, and it would have been of very great benefit to people living within the area of its operation. First the Secretary of War insisted that the company should construct a lock to cost a half million dollars or more. This the company agreed to do. The Secretary of War then insisted that the company should pay a percentage of its profits into the Federal Treasury. Then the Senate intervened; that is, several very influential Senators urged that the Federal Government had no constitutional right to impose such conditions, and, whether constitutional or not, it was establishing a very bad precedent which could not be permitted, and so that charter like many others was smothered. Like the donkey in the fable that stood midway between two stacks of hay and starved to death because he could not make up his mind which stack was the best, Congress has stood between the two schools of thought upon this subject—State control or Federal control—and nothing has been done.

I do not think that this is the way to administer the inexhaustible sources of power in the interests of the people. Water power will always be unable to meet the needs of our industrial activities, such as ocean transportation, long-distance continental transportation, and the automobile service. But there are large sections of the country and very large industrial and domestic needs for which hydroelectric power can be substituted for power produced by the consumption of petroleum and coal. The nation that is without petroleum will be absolutely at the mercy of the nation that has conserved its petroleum. Our geological experts in the Interior Department tell us that there are less than 7,000,000,000 barrels of petroleum left in the wells located in the United States. We sold in this country last year nearly 270,000,000 barrels. If the present increase in consumption continues, there will not be a gallon of petroleum left in the United States in 20 years. I think we will be criminally negligent if we do not insist upon the substitution of water power for that produced by gasoline wherever it can be economically and effectively done. Our supply of subbituminous and lignite and cheap coal is practically inexhaustible, but our supply of high-grade anthracite coal is limited. If the present increase in consumption continues the pinch will begin to be felt in 50 years.

The per diem value of 1 water horsepower is the equivalent of 10 tons of coal. The failure to permit the development of the 30,000 horsepower water plant at Hartford, Conn., means the unnecessary consumption and, I think, essential waste of millions of barrels of petroleum and millions of tons of coal. We are told that there are 30,000,000 undeveloped horsepower in the watercourses of the country to-day, and that there is the possible development of more than 60,000,000 of horsepower. If 20 per cent of the undeveloped water power could be utilized within the next 10 years, the saving in coal and petroleum would be enormous.

It is claimed—and justly claimed—that private companies may develop these water powers for the production of nitrogen and that nitrogen is of prime necessity in the manufacture of powder. It is also true that nitrogen is one of the most valuable of our fertilizers. The agricultural interests of the country will be greatly benefited by any increase in the production of nitrogen. Potash is unobtainable. Should we persist in a policy that will prevent the fixation of nitrogen from the atmosphere because we are afraid that its production can not be properly taxed and regulated?

For 20 years Congress has prevented this development by restrictive legislation. The pending bill is a compromise. It gives the Federal Government full power to regulate, improve, and extend navigation and it leaves to the States full power to impose any condition it sees fit upon the licensee who develops water power for the purpose of producing nitrogen. This is in accordance with the policy of this Government since its formation. If the electrical energy is used for power and goes into interstate commerce, the bill provides that the "rates, charges, and services made and rendered shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and adequate to the public," and confers jurisdiction upon the Interstate Commerce Commission "to enforce this provision upon the complaint of any person aggrieved." I can not believe that those who are opposed to the pending measure have read the last two sections of the bill. Section 12 provides—

That the works constructed and maintained under authority of this act shall not be owned, leased, trusteed, possessed, controlled, or operated by any device or in any manner so that they form part of or in any way effect any combination in the form of an unlawful trust or monopoly, or form the subject of any unlawful contract or conspiracy to limit the output of electric energy or in restraint of trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or Territories, or within any one State or Territory, in the generation, sale, or distribution of electric energy.

Moreover, one very important point seems to be entirely forgotten by those who oppose this bill. The leases can in no case extend beyond a period of 50 years, and section 13 of the bill declares—

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved: Provided, That in case any grantee hereunder shall, at the time of such alteration, amendment, or repeal, have exercised rights in accordance with this act, such rights and the property used thereunder shall be deemed property rights of such grantee, of which such grantee shall not be deprived by such alteration, amendment, or repeal, except upon the conditions provided in case of termination by section 6 of this act.

Here is a plain provision giving the Government full power to repeal this law, cancel any license granted under its provision, and take over the plant by paying to the licensee "the fair value of the property and all capital expenditures required by the United States. If the Secretary of War and the grantee can not agree upon the sum to be paid by the United States, proceedings in equity may be instituted in the United States district courts, and it is especially provided in section 6 that "in the determination of the value of said property for any purpose as between such grantee and the United States or any State no value shall be claimed by or allowed to the grantee for the rights hereunder granted"; that is, nothing is to be allowed for the good will or the franchise. Is it not better to have the water powers developed and the nitrogen in the process of manufacture, always subject to confiscation by the United States upon the payment of a fair value of the plant, than to keep the sources of power and nitrogen locked up until war is declared? It takes time and money, and lots of it, to build dams and equip water-power plants. If the Government should find itself in immediate need of nitrogen to defend itself against sudden attack, would not it be better to have the nitrogen factories running than to have them nonexisting.

I am in favor of the pending measure, because I believe in conserving the exhaustible sources of power by substituting the inexhaustible sources of power wherever it can be economically done. Future generations will never forgive us if we recklessly and extravagantly deprive them of any natural resource, upon which the very life of the Nation may depend. When I contemplate the utter helplessness of an air fleet without gasoline, the utter helplessness of a submarine fleet without gasoline or high-grade coal, I look upon this bill as far more vital to the preparation of the Nation against foreign attack and aggression than is the law that appropriates the money of the people to build air fleets and battleships.

The heat and light and nitrogen produced by water powers must be sold, if sold at all, for less than such commodities produced by coal and oil. The benefits that will result from the development of the water powers must far exceed any benefits that can possibly result from further delays. We have permitted private control, if not monopoly, of the oil fields and coal mines, the exhaustible sources of power. Now we are asked to prevent the development of the inexhaustible sources of power in order that they may compete with and be substituted for coal and oil wherever it is possible. I do not believe that the oil monopolists or the coal monopolists are lobbying against this bill. But is it not just as fair to insinuate and assume that the oil and coal combinations are fighting this bill as it is that the water-power companies are fighting for it. I know and care nothing about that. I am for the bill because I believe that the only way to conserve oil and coal is to save them, and the only way to conserve water power is to use it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, after the word "Provided" and before the colon, insert the following words:

The words "navigable waters" shall be construed to mean such streams and parts of streams which are in fact navigable and used for the transportation of merchandise in interstate and foreign commerce and also such streams and parts of streams as may be designated by the Secretary of War as capable of improvement for the purposes of navigation and transportation of merchandise in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, while I fully appreciate the importance of the bill which is now under consideration and have been instructed by the discussion which has been had, I also realize that the development of the water power, which it is sought in this bill to provide, extends to the newer sections of the country, and that perhaps in the wide sweep which the bill makes some of the older sections may not be reached.

We have had very little trouble in the old State of Maine about water rights and their development. Such development has been the source of wealth in that State, and we have been glad to invite capital to improve those water powers and to build up our manufacturing cities. There would be no reason why there should not be a cotton mill in the State of Maine, if it were not for the fact that we had splendid water powers, so that cotton and coal may be brought from a distance and the manufactured product may be transported back again. For that reason we have made our laws liberal for the development of our water powers. We have proceeded under the old common-law doctrine of riparian rights, and under that we have found the development to be satisfactory and to lend to the upbuilding of the prosperity of our State, situated, as we are, at a disadvantage because of our very location.

In our State most of our rivers are intrastate; they have their rise and they have their mouth in the State. They are navigable in part, and we have always proceeded under the old English rule that navigable waters were those where the tide ebbs and flows. I live upon the Kennebec River, a very important manufacturing river in the State, and it is, in fact, navigable for 50 or 60 miles from its mouth—navigable by steamers and other vessels of considerable size. That part of the river is in fact navigable. The same could be said of the Penobscot River, a large river with large manufacturing interests upon it, and it has also maritime interests. Upon it is the city of Bangor, at one time a city second in the lumbering interest in the whole United States. Vessels came up the river to Bangor, loaded with lumber, and went out to sea and even to other parts of our own country.

Above Augusta, on the Kennebec River, we began water-power development early. Augusta, the capital of Maine, has a splendid water power, and quite early a fine cotton mill was built there. Later other industries were built. Up the river 20 miles is my own city, Waterville, where we have a splendid cotton mill, a large pulp and paper mill, and several other industries dependent upon water power. Only 3 miles above there is still another development, with a very large mill. At Fairfield, still a little above that, there are other water powers, and so on up that River to Moosehead Lake, a large lake 47 miles in length.

We have never considered the Kennebec River navigable above Augusta. We have applied the doctrine of riparian ownership to it, and it has worked out satisfactorily there. We have thought of the owner of both banks of the stream as having the right, under the very liberal dam act which we have, to proceed to build his dam and develop his power, to flow out the land of owners above him and pay damages, or, if damages could not be agreed upon, to have them determined by the court. Under that act, as I said in opening, we have had our development in Maine. We have built our dams and the factories have located there. We use the waters of those rivers for the driving of logs; and to facilitate the driving of logs on many of the streams in the upper stretches tributary to these rivers dams must be built to raise a sufficient head of water to drive the logs.

I have no opposition to the bill as a whole; I recognize that in this grand development which the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] depicted as he looked forward 50 years into the future, we ought to preserve for the people of this Nation the use of these great resources, and that they should not be monopolized; but, on the other hand, I want to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the hardships which this bill will work.

Here in this bill is a penalty of $1,000 if a man builds, to facilitate the driving of logs, a dam across a small stream in the upper stretches of the Kennebec, the Penobscot, and the Androscoggin Rivers. That has been done for 100 years, and with no knowledge that it was in violation of any law, and with the right to do it under the laws of the State.

The distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said the other day that it seemed to him as if New England had become more conservative and more assertive of the rights of the States than were other sections of the country. I hope she has. I believe the splendid dual system of government which our fathers devised should be preserved, and that the things which the State can best do should be left to the State, which can treat best the local interests of her people.

We will proceed as we have been doing under our mill act and under our laws. Our people understand, and will continue to understand, that they still have this right. In our little communities in the beginning we first had to have the grist mills, and they were all collected about some water power. A dam was built, and then the grist mill was built to furnish something to eat. Then came the little woolen mill, and then the little tannery. To-day those exist on small streams with no monopolization of the water power of my State. Their owners run into thousands, and cover not only water powers on the large rivers but they reach out into the rural and mountainous sections of the State. While there is the little sawmill, which does a little sawing for the farmers and manufactures a few shingles, there is still the old woolen mill. It would be a great hardship if we were compelled to come under the construction which is here given to the term "navigable waters." As I understand it, we well agree that now the term "navigable waters" extends to the upper stretches of a river whether it is navigable or not, and the Federal Government, under the pretense that it is promoting navigation where there is no navigation—and that is the only authority that it has—overturns the practices, the customs, and the laws of more than a century in an old State in the Union, which has built up its prosperity upon these water powers, and then it is proposed to inflict a penalty of $1,000, and then I think $1,000 additional for each month that the structure may be continued. By such action, it seems to me, a hardship will be worked which it is not necessary to work.

I fully sympathize with what Senators have in mind who have discussed this bill. I hope with them that I shall see in the next 50 years the realization of the visions so eloquently depicted by the distinguished Senator from Montana, and I expect to see it in that great empire of the West, where you have such splendid resources; but at the same time do not forget the old pioneer, the settler in the older States, who has done the best he could, not under such favorable conditions, but who has helped to build a State worthy of its place in the Union.

I have provided in this amendment that the words "navigable waters"—and they ought to be defined—shall be defined. In the first place, I have asked that they be construed to mean such waters as are navigable in fact for the transportation of merchandise in interstate or foreign commerce. That will take the part of the streams in my State or in any other State which are to-day used for the transportation of merchandise which are in fact navigable, as they are with us. Then my amendment further provides that the words "navigable waters" shall also include—

> Such streams and parts of streams as may be designated by the Secretary of War as capable of improvement for the purposes of navigation and transportation of merchandise in interstate and foreign commerce.

If it is thought by the Secretary of War, representing the Federal Government, that there is an opportunity to establish a waterway in my State above tidal waters and that that power should be exercised, the people should be apprised of that decision and not allowed to go on, as we have been going on for a century under the rule in our State, under the authority granted by the law of our State.

My own opinion is that the authority should still be left with the States, where I think it belongs and which can best look after it. I think we have not frittered away our water rights. The manufacturers upon our rivers have joined together and established great water-power companies to conserve the waters. They have built their dams for conservation at the head lakes which feed those rivers. They know when they get a season of low water just what the height is in their conservation ponds, and every manufacturer upon the river is ready to unite with the others and throw off a part of his load, throw off a part of his machinery. The water is utilized, and no board of engineers from Washington need come down into Maine to tell those men of experience, whose moneys have been invested in their enterprises, how they may best conserve the waters of those rivers.

But if there is to be Federal control, it should be where there is to be navigation and where there is constitutional authority for Federal control. Let the words "navigable waters," then, be defined; and let it be said to the people in States situated as they are in Maine what rivers are capable of improvement. If you think our Kennebec River can be made a great waterway from Augusta for 200 miles to Moosehead Lake and you want to have it improved, let us know that fact, and let us conform with the requirements which may be established; but there are a great many tributaries, some of them quite large, to that river, and a good many small streams which flow into these smaller tributaries. On them all you will find little sawmills; you will find little grist mills; you will find a company building a dam to float its logs. So I think we ought to define the term, and make it plain, so that if that river, for instance, is to be improved for navigation, the people shall be apprised of that fact, and not be made amenable to a law which provides a penalty which would result in extreme hardship to them.

It seems to me that the amendment which I have offered will in no way impair the purposes of this bill, and I do not wish to be understood at all as opposing control by the Federal Government of water powers which can be lawfully controlled by the Federal Government under its constitutional authority.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the Senator's explanation of his amendment. He always speaks clearly and with the result of instructing those who listen to him. I want to ask him, therefore, whether the amendment which he proposes, which seems to confer upon the Secretary of War the authority and power of determining what is or what is not a navigable stream, does not go so far as to invest that official with the arbitrary power of determining that fact, although the streams to which his determination applies may in fact not be navigable?

In my section, where the great rivers, or some of them, of the country have their origin there are no navigable streams, yet the tendency of recent years has been, partly on account of the desire to secure appropriations under river and harbor bills and partly for the purpose of extending the so-called system of conservation, and perhaps for other reasons, to embrace in the term "navigable streams," and through the agency of the War Department, tributaries to streams which may become navigable by improvement. Now, if the proposed amendment does not confer upon one official, or some official or a body of officials, for that matter, such a power, the amendment is perhaps free from criticism from my standpoint; but if it does involve an authority which is as extensive as that I have supposed, and which could very readily be utilized in the hands of a man not entirely familiar, I will say, with a particular stream or a particular section of the country, it might result in very great hardship; and it is that which, so far as I am concerned, I would like to be informed about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Colorado, I will say that I understand, since the decision in the Rio Grande case, that lawyers are pretty much united in the idea that where a river is navigable in part, it is navigable to its source and through all its little tributaries. I heard that announced upon the floor of the Senate by the distinguished ex-Senator from New York, Mr. Root, and with a good deal of wonderment I heard it supported here. I have read the report of the Waterways Commission, on which served eight distinguished Senators of this body, and they reported that the navigability of rivers extends to the upper stretches of those rivers and are therefore subject to Federal control. So that practically all the waters which are tributary to any river that is navigable—and most all the small streams finally find their way to such a river—are themselves navigable. It is for that reason that I felt that I should like to have some power lodged somewhere to determine the fact whether or not a river was to be improved for navigation, and not leave the people in a State like my own in the position in which they would be if that fact could not be determined.

Now, I have no suspicion that any Secretary of War will ever think that the Kennebec River above Augusta is going to be made a great waterway for transportation, nor the Penobscot, nor the Androscoggin; but, under the definition which has been given and to which all here seem to accede, both those who are supporting this bill and those who are opposing it, those rivers are navigable to their very utmost reaches in the mountains, and every little mountain stream that comes down over the rocks and helps the lumberman in the spring to bring his logs down is a navigable stream. We say in my State they are "floatable." We stop navigation where it really stops, and we do not talk about such streams having any navigable capacity.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I am not one of those Senators who believe that the upper stretches of navigable streams are also navigable in a legal sense and under the control of Congress or of the Secretary of War. I do not accept that definition of navigable streams, and this bill does not apply to such waters as the Senator has described. I merely wanted the Senator to understand that I did not go as far as he stated that others do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes; but I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. Take a river like the Kennebec River, which is a river of depth. One of the great iron works, which now has contracts to build destroyers for this Government and which has built battleships, is located on that river. It builds very large vessels, six-masters, which draw 28 feet of water, and float out from the wharves of that company, which are some distance up the Kennebec River. Even up to Augusta vessels may proceed. A steamer connects the little city of Gardiner, 8 or 9 miles below Augusta, with the city of Boston, and plies back and forth two or three times a week transporting passengers and freight. When we come to Augusta there is a dam and a big cotton mill and a pulp and paper mill, and from there to my city of Waterville, 20 miles, there could be water enough, and would be water enough, to float a vessel of considerable size; in fact, in the old days vessels were built on that river at my city and floated down to tidewater, but to-day there is no lock in the dam, and there is a big manufacturing plant there. The Kennebec could be made navigable not only to Waterville, but when you got to Waterville, by a good system of locks, and so forth, you could get around there; and I suppose the river could be made navigable for 200 miles if you wanted to expend the money and there was any necessity for so improving it. Now, where would the Senator stop on that river with navigation and say that it had ceased to be navigable? The tide ebbs and flows up to the city of Augusta, and then come dams. On its course up to Moosehead Lake, for a couple of hundred miles, it receives a good many tributaries. Where does the term "navigable" cease to apply to that river?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in my opinion the correct definition of a navigable stream, according to the weight of authority as shown by the adjudged cases in both State and Federal courts, is one that is capable of navigation by commercial vessels, ascending and descending, for the purpose of carrying commerce. There are a class of streams called "floatable streams," in which the public have a qualified right or easement of highway for floating logs; but they are not navigable streams, in my opinion, in the sense of the commerce clause of the Constitution, under which Congress has the power to regulate transportation upon them.

I do not know the facts with regard to the river to which the Senator has referred, and, of course, I can not give an opinion concerning its navigability; but if that river is susceptible of improvement by a reasonable expenditure of money so as to make it fit for commerce, ascending and descending, it seems to me it would be navigable and within the jurisdiction of Congress. I can give the best illustration of my views by a river in my State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Before the Senator leaves my river let me ask him about that a little further. I understand the Senator's definition. Now, let me ask him if it be true and it is determined that the river to which I have referred is capable of improvement for navigation—and there is water enough in it to make navigation possible—then is it not true that every little stream that feeds it and every little tributary of it is under the control of the Federal Government, because they affect and promote navigation in the river, and therefore obstructions could not be built on them without the consent of the Federal Government?

Mr. THOMAS. Not only the tributaries, but the sources of supply—the rain from heaven and the clouds from which the rain descends.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is a claim to the extent which the Senator from Maine has stated; but the absurdity of it, in my opinion, is demonstrated by the comment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], for, if you can go up into the creeks, you can go to the spring branches, then to the springs, and then to the clouds, from which the rains descend. The definition of "navigable waters" must have some reasonable meaning, and there must be a reasonable limit.

Now, I will give an illustration from my own State. The Tennessee is one of the greatest rivers in the United States, and is susceptible of improvement for many hundred miles from its mouth, where it flows into the Ohio, and it has very valuable water powers on it, amounting to a million or more horsepower. Its headwaters extend into Virginia and North Carolina, and it flows through Alabama, and again into Tennessee and into Kentucky. Therefore it is an interstate stream. Near the city where I live, Knoxville, a tributary called the Little Tennessee flows into it, from its source up in the Great Smoky Mountains. This tributary is not navigable for vessels ascending or descending; and counsel who have investigated the matter under our statutes advised the American Aluminum Co. that it was not a navigable stream in the legal sense, and therefore that it was necessary for that company to come to Congress to get consent to build dams in it; and that company is now expending some $2,000,000 in constructing a series of dams for water whereby they expect to develop 120,000 horsepower. That, in my opinion, is not a navigable stream, and is not subject to control by Congress. The company is proceeding under a permit granted it by the General Assembly of Tennessee. This concrete case illustrates my views upon this question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Let me ask the Senator a further question. Suppose, however, the Federal Government should find that the dam which has been built on the Little Tennessee obstructs navigation, and therefore that it lessens the flow of water, or diverts water, and therefore decreases the navigability of the Tennessee River. Would not the Government, if it found that to be the case, remove the obstructions in the Little Tennessee?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think it could. I do not think Congress has control over that river.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. It is for that reason, and recognizing that condition, that I offered the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. But I will never give my consent to the proposition that Congress has the right to assume jurisdiction over the spring branches of the country and interfere with the building of gristmills or any other development where the power is directly applied on small streams. It never was intended that this bill should apply to any but the great water powers which can be used for the development of hydroelectricity; and that can not be done by the power that is afforded by small streams. We must go to the great rivers for that purpose. Those are the only ones that are valuable for that purpose, and the only ones intended to be affected by this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. But the power which is to be developed under the bill presented here is not to be limited to the development of hydroelectric power; it applies to any power, the most common uses to which I have referred. It was because I saw this doubt that I thought we were entitled to have some definition of the words and to what they would apply.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the proposed amendment. I may say that I am in sympathy with the Senator's proposition. I suggested to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], when he opened the debate on this bill, that I thought it would be well to define the term "navigable waters," as used in the act. But the Senator has said here that—

> The words "navigable waters" shall be construed to mean such streams and parts of streams which are in fact navigable and used for the transportation of merchandise in interstate and foreign commerce.

I do not believe the Senator intends to confine that to a stream that might in fact be navigable but upon which there was no interstate or foreign commerce. I would suggest to the Senator, if that is his idea—and I can not conceive how he would have any other in that respect—that the words "in interstate and foreign commerce" ought to be stricken out.

Let me say to the Senator that, as I view his amendment, there are two qualifications in this definition so far. One qualification is that the stream, or part of stream, must be in fact navigable. Now, that is not enough. It could not apply to that. It could stop right there, although we might admit that it was in fact navigable and used for the transportation of merchandise in interstate and foreign commerce. For instance, I believe the Detroit River, connecting two of the Great Lakes, is all within one State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Pardon me for the interruption, but, if I catch the Senator's meaning, it is that there is other commerce besides interstate and foreign commerce, domestic commerce in the State itself, which it might be used for.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there may be. In other words, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there may be a stream that is in fact navigable, about which there can be no doubt, but it may be all within the boundaries of a State, and there may be no interstate or foreign commerce on the stream.

I will say to the Senator that I see that the illustration I gave would not apply, because there would be interstate commerce there. I gave it offhand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I, myself, think all the purpose I had in mind would be served if I should strike out the words "interstate and foreign," and simply let it read, "used for the transportation of merchandise" of any kind.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that would be better than the suggestion I have made, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine accepts the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to strike out the words "interstate and foreign."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; those three words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. And I will make the same correction in the ninth and tenth lines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the ninth and tenth lines, the Senator moves to amend his amendment by striking out the words "Interstate and foreign."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire, further, to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the word "provided"—although in the amendment it is printed "provide," I suppose that is a typographical error; I think the Senator means "provided"—appears twice in the line to which he refers. On page 2, line 13, of the bill the word "provided" appears twice. The Senator means to insert this amendment after the word "provided" where it first appears, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the further description, "and before the colon," designates which word "provided" is referred to.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true. The other "provided" does not have any colon.

There is still another suggestion that I wish to make to the Senator. Ought he not to add after the word "waters" in the third line of his amendment the words "as used in this act"? I would not want to have a definition made that might by any possible construction be applied to some other law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I supposed that really was understood and provided for.

Mr. NORRIS. It probably might be construed to mean that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes. Of course, I intended that, and I had supposed that would be understood—"the words 'navigable waters' as used in this act."

Mr. NORRIS. "For the purposes of this act."

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I shall be very glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine accepts the suggested amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] had risen. I yield to him first, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest that to my mind this amendment is indefinite. I quite agree with what the Senator has said with relation to making a division between the upper waters and the lower waters. I think it is wise, and I think it ought to be done. I do not think it ought to be left to the Secretary of War, however. I think that ought to be determined by Congress itself.

I wish to make this suggestion, to see how it strikes the Senator, because he has probably given more thought to it than I have. Suppose we insert, after the word "navigable," the words "by vessels of draft of —— feet or more." It is indefinite to say "navigable." Navigable for what? A draft of 1 foot, 2 feet, 3 feet, or what? Is it possible that we may have some Senators who think that the upper waters of a stream are navigable when they are really in the mountains? If you are going to define it, it seems to me you ought to make it something definite, so that Congress may determine the matter.

I would suggest that some number of feet might be inserted. I care not how much it may be, whether it is 2 feet, 3 feet, 4 feet, or 5 feet. I suggest that that be inserted, so that it will read:

> The words "navigable waters" shall be construed to mean such streams and parts of streams which are, in fact, navigable by vessels of draft of 3 feet—
> Or "2 feet" or "4 feet"—
> or more.

Why would not that clearly define the matter by an act of Congress, instead of leaving it to the opinion of an executive officer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. In answer to his inquiry, however, I will say that the difficulties which I have in mind would not be reached at all by that.

In my opinion nobody would think of making the great Kennebec River, in my State, a navigable river. We have not thought of it. We do not need it. We have all our means of transportation by rail and by our trolley lines. There is no water navigation; but there would be more than 3 feet of water or 4 feet or 5 feet above the city of Augusta, which I mentioned, and for a long distance up that river.

I do not think that ought to determine the navigability of the river. It seemed to me that the Secretary of War, who is the officer here having charge of all these matters, was the proper authority to whom that question should be referred. If there is a public demand which reaches him that that river should be made a navigable river, and that the owners of those power developments should put in locks and canals and make the stream navigable, he should determine it, and they will have to comply.

What I had in mind and desired to reach was, as I said, the people who for a century have gone along under a State law and, with the authority of a State, have made their developments upon the smaller streams. Many of those streams tributary to the Kennebec River would have the depth referred to by the Senator from Colorado, where I know that even the Secretary of War would not for a moment think of going for the purpose of developing a waterway. I do not think you could reach the matter by going at it in that way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can easily see why the people who have put dams in that river should be protected; but I must say that when you leave it to the Secretary of War, if the Secretary of War were of the opinion of some of the Senators who formed the commission to which reference has been made, he might declare this to be a navigable river far up above the point where the Senator thinks a resonable man would consider it navigable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why would it not be better, therefore, for Congress to define this thing, instead of leaving it absolutely to the opinion of any man?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The principle advanced by the Senator from Colorado is absolutely right, but it is absolutely impossible to work it in practice. Congress has not the information, and can not possibly get the information, by which it will be able to pass an act defining the exact point at which the navigation of the Columbia River ends, the exact point at which the navigation of the Snake River ends, the exact point at which the navigation of the Kootenai River ends, the exact point at which the navigation of the Des Moines River ends, the exact point at which the navigation of every river in Maine ends, every river in Alabama ends, and every river in Wisconsin ends. The Senator from Colorado can see that that is not practical.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can readily see that they can not determine the fact in any one river except by the rule. When you have a rule saying that it must be capable of carrying vessels of a draft of 3 feet, that is a designation by means of which anybody can find out, whereas if you are going to leave it without any qualification whatever to the Secretary of War, why can not he take the same view that the commission took that was appointed by this body, and say to the Senator from Maine, "We regard that all as navigable"? It is a matter of determination; and whether it is navigable by a vessel of 1 foot draft or 2 feet draft or 3 feet draft or 4 feet draft, he could say, "Well, I do not believe in any 3-foot theory; I believe in a 6-inch theory," and thereby he could absolutely control this matter contrary to the very wishes of the Senator from Maine.

I want to say that I expect to vote for the Senator's amendment whether it contains this language or not, and I am not certain that I will offer it as an amendment to his; but I want to study it and see whether making it more definite will not improve the character of the amendment.

Mr. WORKS, Mr. JONES, and Mr. HUSTING addressed the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. If the Senators will pardon me for a moment, I will say, in reply to the Senator from Colorado, that I certainly should like to have it made more definite; but it seems to me that the sentiment in the country, the sentiment in this body, and the sentiment among the good lawyers of the country has proceeded so far to-day that all of the waters of my State are navigable waters. That seems to be the sentiment which has been crystallized; and I have heard it asserted here that a river navigable in part is navigable through its tributaries and to its very sources. If that is the definition of "navigable waters," I think we ought to have it defined. That is what I have been trying to reach, and not leave it indefinite. If we apply this test of draft, I am afraid it would apply to many rivers which never will be considered navigable, are not to-day, and never will be used for navigation.

I have in mind the Dead River, through which Benedict Arnold went on that famous trip to Canada, when he came up the Kennebec River and then carried across into the waters of the Dead River. That river would have a great deal more depth than the Senator speaks of. It was sufficient for Arnold to take his expedition up it to the foot of Bigelow Mountain. They have water power on that river. If you should put the draft at 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 feet, you would then put that all under the control of the Federal Government. I do not think that would help us any.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of some amendment to this bill that will define what constitutes a navigable stream. I think the first portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine is sufficient for that purpose, but I am not at all in sympathy with the following clause in the amendment:

> And also such streams and parts of streams as may be designated by the Secretary of War as capable of improvement for the purposes of navigation and transportation of merchandise—

And so forth. I think it is time enough to apply this act to a stream when it has actually become a navigable stream, not upon the theory that it may be capable of being made a navigable stream at some future time which is exceedingly indefinite.

There are a good many streams in this country that are capable of being made navigable that probably never will be made navigable. There are doubtless some of them in the Senator's own State. I am quite sure there are some in my State. It seems to me that that would be a very unfortunate provision to insert in the bill.

There may be some question as to whether or not it is necessary that there should be any definition of a navigable stream at all in view of what has been said about it by the Supreme Court of the United States. That court has endeavored to define what shall constitute a navigable stream, and probably has done so quite as well as we can do it by any legislation that may be enacted here. I call the Senator's attention to the case of The Montello, which is reported in Eighty-seventh United States Reports, commencing at page 430. At page 439 the court says:

> This court held in the case of the Daniel Ball that those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. If the Senator will pardon me just a minute, the very language of the court makes it seem necessary that some provision should be made. They say "susceptible of navigation"—not only those that are now used, but those that are susceptible of improvement, as I understand.

Mr. WORKS. Oh, no; not susceptible of improvement; susceptible in their present condition of being used for commercial purposes. I doubt very much whether we can define "navigable streams" any better by any provision that we may insert in this bill than the term has already been defined by the Supreme Court.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, from what case does the Senator read?

Mr. WORKS. I am reading from Eighty-seventh United States, the case of the Montello. The definition is evidently quoted from the Daniel Ball, which was reported in Tenth Wallace, page 557. I assume that that is about as correct a definition as could be given of a navigable stream.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think so.

Mr. WORKS. And it seems to me that where we use the words "navigable stream" in a statute, that definition will be applied to it. I have felt all along that there should be some definition in this bill that should limit the effect of it to actually navigable streams; but if the use of that term, as applied to the definition of the Supreme Court, is sufficient for that purpose, then it would be unnecessary to amend the bill in that particular.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator from California a question in this connection. Suppose we repeal section 10 of the act of 1900, and sections 9 and 10 of the act of 1899, prohibiting the construction of dams over navigable waters without the consent of Congress. If we should repeal those laws, prohibiting the construction of dams without the consent of Congress, would not this definition of the Supreme Court then cover the case, and give us the proper relief?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; I think it would. But I rose not so much for the purpose of aiding the Senator in that respect as to call his attention to what I think is the objectionable part of his amendment. I am very much in favor of the other portion of it, but I hardly think it would be wise to provide in this bill for the protection under it of streams that the Secretary of War may think are capable of being made navigable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. In reply to what the Senator from California says, I would say that so far as my State is concerned the first part of the amendment would reach conditions there; but I had thought of conditions elsewhere in the country where rivers are being improved all the time for navigation, particularly in the West, and where at the present time there is in fact no navigation, and they are not navigable and are not used for transportation of merchandise, but are capable of being made so by improvements which are being made. It was for that reason that I thought it necessary to add that the Secretary of War might designate the rivers which, in his opinion, were capable for improvement for navigation.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Colorado suggests that pretty much every stream is capable of being made navigable, if you spend enough money for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. In fact we have made navigable streams by constructing canals where there was no stream at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Therefore that definition might cover almost anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Of course, the Senator from California does not expect, and neither do I, that any Secretary of War who might be holding that high office would think of spending the people's money foolishly upon a project where there seemed to be no reasonable promise that the stream could be made capable of navigation, except at a tremendous and extravagant expense.

Mr. WORKS. No; I should not expect the Secretary of War to do anything of that kind; but what necessity is there for any provision of this kind at all? When the stream is made navigable it is time enough then to apply the law to it.

Mr. HUSTING and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield, and to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, who rose first. Later I will yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether, in his State, they have any lakes that constitute the reservoirs or headwaters of the rivers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. We have, and they are used by the manufacturing interests and the log-driving interests. On my own river we had formed 20 years ago a corporation in which all the manufacturing interests on the river, from the first portion at Augusta to Moosehead Lake, became interested, and they have spent a great deal of money in improving that river. They joined with a log-driving company to blast out ledges and rocks upon which the logs had been accustomed to jam, making it necessary to use a great deal of water from the reservoir lakes, and built sheer booms, and expended a great deal of money in conserving the waters; and they, through this company, watch the waters in the lake.

Moosehead Lake, as I have said, is 47 miles long. It is a large reservoir. This company, through its officers, controls, in the interest of all—the interest of the log-driving company and the interest of all manufacturers—the water on that river; and it is valuable to them, particularly when winter comes on. Our dry season is likely to be January and February, when every little stream is frozen up and there are no melting snows and no rains to reach the waters, and the surface of the lakes is congealed into ice, and we have to look after that water. Nobody will do it so well as the men who are going to use it and who unite in harmony for that purpose.

We have had very little trouble in our State over water rights. We have applied the touchstone of reasonable use, and have said to the riparian owner, "You own your water power as much as the farmer owns his farm or the merchant owns his block, and you have a right to the reasonable use of the water that flows by you, as you have a right to the reasonable use of the air which envelops the farm or envelops the block." We have gotten along very well in our State with very little litigation between the owners of water rights, and they have recognized the importance of uniting.

I say that in answer to the Senator's question. I did not mean to be so long.

Mr. HUSTING. Let me ask the Senator whether Moosehead Lake is navigable?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Oh, yes; it is navigable. There are steamers of some size upon it.

Mr. HUSTING. What river rises in it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. The Kennebec River is the river that flows from it.

Mr. HUSTING. In its lower reaches is the Kennebec River navigable?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes; for 50 or 60 miles.

Mr. HUSTING. There is just one more question I should like to ask the Senator in regard to the effect of the change proposed by him—whether, in using the words "navigable waters," he is merely attempting to restrict the operation of this proposed law or whether the effect of those words would be to abandon, as a right of the United States, jurisdiction over rivers over which it now has jurisdiction?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. In reply to the Senator's question I will state that I hope it will be an abandonment of some of the rights which are claimed as far as nonnavigable rivers are concerned, because I think the State can best control those in the interest of its people. As I said in opening, I believe there is no better example and illustration of the wisdom of the dual system of government which the fathers devised than in this case, where the local waters and the local interests will be controlled by the States.

Mr. HUSTING. If the Senator please, the jurisdiction of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution has been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. What I should like to know is whether the Senator would like to change the construction of the Supreme Court and, by statute, restrict the jurisdiction of the United States in contravention of what the Supreme Court has found that the constitutional jurisdiction of the United States is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I will say that I do not know that I am trying to restrict at all any interpretation of the Supreme Court of the United States; but I am trying to restrict the interpretation which many good lawyers put upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and have it made definite, and to save my people, as I said awhile ago, from violating a statute here in following out the State law on which they think they have authority to act.

Mr. HUSTING. I was trying to get the Senator's idea as to whether it was the intention of the amendment which is proposed merely to restrict the operation of this law, retaining whatever jurisdiction the United States always has had, or whether, in effect, it means to give a new definition or new limitation to the meaning of "navigable waters," not only in connection with this bill, but for all purposes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I will say to the Senator that it is only in connection with this bill, and, of course, the purpose is not to restrict, except to confine the operation of the act to waters that are really in fact navigable or which, as I stated, it is provided further are capable of being made navigable, in the opinion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Maine in all that he has said with respect to eliminating from the operation of the bill streams that are not used in commerce. I have offered two amendments to the bill, which are now printed and which are intended to reach in a general way the same result.

The difficulty with the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, while it might cover the situation in Maine, is that it would not reach the difficulty in some other States. He suggested, in answer to the Senator from California, that he thought there was no danger that a Secretary of War would include the smaller streams that simply have the potentiality of navigation in them. I am afraid that his confidence in that respect is not well founded—and I am not criticizing a Secretary of War—for no longer than two or three years ago a Secretary of War did classify a stream in my State that has not borne a single pound of commerce in 60 years and is utterly incapable of bearing the burdens of commerce until it is improved, as a navigable water.

I am afraid that the outcome of this amendment, if it were adopted just in the form in which it is, would be that the Secretary of War, looking forward into the future and fearing that he might classify streams erroneously, would at once classify all the streams of the country which have water enough in them to be navigable under improvement as navigable streams, and we would lose the entire benefit of the attempt to construe or to define the words "navigable waters."

Just a word in answer to the suggestion by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING]. It is obvious, of course, that we can not by any act of Congress diminish our powers under the Constitution. Our power is to regulate commerce among the States, and we can regulate it in almost any way that we desire. I have no doubt that we could enter any stream in the United States, however insignificant, for the purpose of making it navigable and in that way subjecting it to commerce. I have no doubt we could build a canal across the country where there is no stream at all for the purpose of carrying on commerce. But that does not reach the point, I think, that has been so well sustained by the Senator from Maine. We can limit the application of this bill to any streams which we may classify or define. We could limit the operation of the bill to the Mississippi River if we wanted to do so, or to the Columbia River, or any other stream. So we are in nowise interfering with or trying to abdicate our constitutional rights or power when we confine the bill to a particular kind of a stream.

I am perfectly willing myself to take the definition of the Supreme Court of the United States, but I want it in this bill, so that it may not be shaded upon or qualified in the future by those who are to interpret it. I would far rather take the definition of a navigable stream as given by the distinguished author of the bill in a case which he decided when chief justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee. I have examined a great many cases relating to this subject, and I have found in none of them so complete and so understandable a definition of the words "navigable waters" or "navigable streams" as is found in the opinion to which I refer. I would be delighted if we would lift the definition out of that opinion and embody it in this bill, so far as the streams are concerned, which are to be covered by the conditions of the measure.

But there is another suggestion which I desire to make to the Senator from Maine. I fear that the amendment is incomplete in this, that when the streams which are segregated from all other streams by the definition given in the amendment are set apart there will yet remain streams, and many of them, which are within the jurisdiction of Congress, and which a Secretary of War acting with perfect honesty would classify as navigable waters. Then the acts of 1900 and 1899 would operate upon them, and there would be no authority whatever for the building of dams in such streams, and no authority for anyone who wanted to build such a dam to apply to the Secretary of War for the necessary permission. There would be nothing for those who wanted to build dams in such streams to do but to apply to Congress for an act conferring the authority.

I have stated so much because I wanted the Senator from Maine to understand the basis of the request I am about to make of him. I think all of us who are interested in this particular phase of the bill have had more or less discussion with the author of the bill with respect to it. I have reason to believe that, so far as the Senator who is managing the bill on the floor of the Senate is concerned, we can reach a satisfactory expression or definition of navigable waters, and also some provision relating to the streams that might come within the jurisdiction of Congress but would not be included in the bill. In view of these considerations, will not the Senator be willing that the amendment shall be passed over; that is to say, that a vote shall not be taken on it at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I am very willing to yield to the request of the Senator from Iowa and have the amendment passed over for the present. So it may go over.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Yes; I yield the floor. I have finished.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, what I desire to say in this connection is that most of the amendment of the Senator from Maine conforms to the language of the decision of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has laid down in the case of Ball as clear a definition as we could possibly put. But even if you had that definition in the bill you would still be at the mercy of the War Department that we have been during all these years because of provisions in the river and harbor acts of 1890 and 1899. There are sections in each of those acts which positively prohibit the construction of any dams that affect the navigable capacity of a river without the express consent of Congress. So, unless you repeal those sections, even with the definition you have in the bill, you will be no nearer reaching a case such as the Senator from Iowa pointed out the other day.

Therefore, I regard it as far more important to repeal those prohibitive sections in the river and harbor acts I have referred to than to put this amendment into the bill, because the amendment is practically the law now as interpreted by the Supreme Court, and you do not get anything more reliable by reiterating it in this bill. The vital part to accomplish what the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine want is to repeal those provisions of the river and harbor acts I have called attention to. I will quote from those acts. I read from the act of 1890, section 10:

That the creation of any obstruction, not affirmatively authorized by law, to the navigable capacity of any waters, in respect of which the United States has jurisdiction, is hereby prohibited.

There is another section, section 7 of the same act, the river and harbor act, that relates to the same subject.

Section 10 of the river and harbor act of 1899 reads as follows:

That the creation of any obstruction, not affirmatively authorized by Congress, to the navigable capacity of any of the waters of the United States is hereby prohibited.

It is under these acts that the War Department has refused to give its consent to such cases as the Senator from Iowa referred to. If you examine the decision of the Supreme Court in the Rio Grande case, and I have it here before me but will not take the time to read it, you will find that it is put exactly upon this language of the act of 1890.

Now, my notion is that until we repeal these prohibitive provisions we can never succeed in getting the relief that the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Iowa desire. I quite agree with those Senators. I do not want the Government to have the veto power on the construction of dams.

I can remember when I was a young man in the State of Wisconsin we had any number of such dams and water powers in that State as the Senator from Maine described as being in his State. They were constructed, and the rule of riparian ownership, as the Senator from Maine has described it, existed in that State. We had a State law under which persons could construct dams, and we had little sawmills and gristmills scattered over those streams. In later years some of those water powers have given place to power for electric light and woolen and cotton mills and other factories, but it was all done under State authority. We want that power left in the States. In respect to all streams that are not navigable as defined by the decision of the Supreme Court, we want the power left in the State and not in the Federal Government, to the end that the States through their laws and their administration may carry on the necessary improvements in the shape of dam construction, for I believe no power is more effective or can do it better than the State power in respect to the concerns over which it has jurisdiction and control. I am utterly unwilling to agree to any doctrine that would detract and diminish the power of the States in these respects.

Therefore I shall ask the Senator from Tennessee, who has charge of the bill, to agree to an amendment substantially as I have written it. I will read it in this connection. Those provisions refer not only to dams but also to other obstructions—wharves, piers, and so forth. So I have framed the amendment in this way:

That sections 7 and 10 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved September 19, 1890, and sections 9 and 10 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, so far as they relate to the construction and maintenance of dams over and across streams, rivers, and watercourses, are hereby repealed.

I do not use the term "navigable stream"; I use the term "streams, rivers, and watercourses." So far as relates to them in general, we repeal it and leave the statute blank in that respect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize the truth of every word the Senator from Minnesota has uttered, and I hope he will note that I have endeavored to reach the same result and possibly go a little further than he through my amendment, for after defining "navigable waters" in practically the way in which it is defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, I further say:

Provided further, That with respect to all other streams—

That is, the real navigable streams, those navigable in fact—over which Congress has jurisdiction, under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, permission is hereby given to construct dams therein, subject, however, to removal or reconstruction, without expense to the United States whenever the United States enters upon the improvement thereof for the purpose of making the same usable for interstate or foreign transportation.

In that way, of course, in so far as the river and harbor acts to which the Senator from Minnesota has referred are concerned, and in so far as they forbid the erection of dams, I repeal them all by granting express authority to build dams in these streams. But I do not at all say that the way the Senator from Minnesota has suggested is not the best way to reach the desired end.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator understands me. My view is that if you absolutely repeal those sections I have quoted prohibiting the construction of dams there is no need to make any other definition of what are navigable waters than what is found in the decision of the Supreme Court in the Ball case. There is the law laid down as near as we can lay it down in the bill before us. While I have no objection to anything being inserted in the bill in the language of the decision of the Supreme Court, it seems to me it is wholly unnecessary if we repeal those prohibitive sections. That is my view of it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, before we leave this particular subject I should like to say a few words on it.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], who offered the amendment, stated that the purpose of it was not in any way to abandon or curtail the jurisdiction or authority of the United States in certain waters, but merely to restrict the application of this bill to certain waters. In other words, it is the purpose of the amendment to make this law as narrow in its application as possible.

The effect of this amendment if it were adopted would, as far as a water-power bill is concerned, be of little practical application except to very few rivers, and as to those rivers for a very short distance.

We have heard a great deal in the last few years about the necessity of conserving the water powers of our rivers, and this measure, I believe, was introduced as a water-power measure. I presume the authors of the bill think it is a good one, and it seems to me that if they think the bill is a good one they ought to make its beneficent effects as widespread as possible. If this is a good bill, it ought not to be narrowed in its application. It ought to be widened in its application so that the whole country instead of only a limited part of it may have the full benefit of the act.

As I said, there has been a great deal of talk about water powers and water-power legislation, and if it is going to amount to anything, in my humble judgment it ought to be done in a way that will give the greatest effect, the greatest good, the greatest amount of conservation of water power that we can get all over the United States.

I do not think it is going to do much good to have a bill apply only in part to a river, a part under the jurisdiction of the United States, a part under the jurisdiction of the State, and a part under the jurisdiction and control of neither, but of private owners. If it is going to amount to anything, it ought to be a system covering all the navigable streams of the United States.

There has been a bill introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], a waterways scheme. If that is going to amount to anything, it will require the broadest control and require the broadest jurisdiction that the United States can exercise.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] stated certain conditions in his State which are very similar to conditions in Wisconsin. In northern Wisconsin we have a great many lakes—hundreds, if not thousands, of them. These are natural reservoirs that are navigable by steamboats and launches. Mails are carried over those lakes. In some instances there are large boats plying between the lakes, carrying freight. Those lakes are the headwaters of all the great rivers of Wisconsin, and eventually empty into the Mississippi River or into Green Bay and Lake Michigan. In other words, they are tributary to the Mississippi or to the St. Lawrence. Those lakes are deep. They are surrounded by high banks and hills and have very narrow outlets. The outlets are so narrow at their immediate source that they would scarcely carry a log down, to say nothing about a rowboat. The streams develop as they go down. For instance, we have the Manitowish waters; we have the Turtle waters; we have the Eagle waters, all of which have their rise in those lakes in the lake region or reservoir part of Wisconsin.

I am only mentioning Wisconsin, but, I presume, Minnesota and Maine and a great many other States have the same sort of situation; and I am only mentioning these to illustrate what I am about to contend in regard to this matter.

These lakes empty, at least at the beginning of their outlets, by small streams that you can almost jump across, but as they go down farther in a southerly direction other streams pour into those streams, finally forming confluence by larger streams. For instance, the Manitowish waters and the Turtle waters form the Flambeau River. The Flambeau River finally forms a confluence with the North Fork of the Chippewa River, and eventually is a mighty stream at the point where it empties into the Mississippi River.

Under the amendment the Senator suggests, while the United States might retain jurisdiction over those lakes and it might retain jurisdiction over the few miles above the mouth of rivers like the Chippewa River and the Wisconsin River that may be commercially navigable, and yet the control of the reaches between the lakes, which are the source and the place where it empties into the river—almost the entire river—would be practically under private control.

It is apparent to me, it would seem to be apparent to all, that the control of those intervening stretches of the river between the lakes and the mouth of that stream are just as essential to navigation in that part of the Chippewa River as far and to the extent that that particular part is navigable.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am interested in this part of the question, because it affects a part of my State. If it be granted that the Federal Government can go beyond the actual navigable stream under that clause of the Constitution giving the Federal power jurisdiction over navigable streams, it will go to the first branch of it, which confessedly is not navigable. How far will you go up that stream until you hit another, and how far will the Federal jurisdiction extend at last? Can it stop short of any individual spring which empties into the river?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; I think it will.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Where will it stop?

Mr. HUSTING. At the point where navigability stops. The Senator from Colorado suggested it might extend to the rainfall, but that is stretching it some. I think that may properly be left to the jurisdiction of the Almighty. I think He will probably take care of that. I say as far as putting the reaches between the upper waters of a stream and the mouth of that stream in the hands of private owners, to manipulate the waters as they see fit, not in a manner that is good for all the people of the United States or for navigation, but in a manner that is good for their particular business—paper business or anything of that sort—is turning over and surrendering the entire sovereignty of the United States to private individuals, to be used by them as they see fit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, if the United States has no sovereignty over any water in the United States except the mere right to use it for commercial purposes—in other words, for navigation—if you extend it beyond that it would take the first tributary, and if it would take the first tributary confessedly the riparian right is still retained on either side absolutely. Then it would proceed necessarily to any point in the stream that led to navigation, as they have already done in the Rio Grande case, extending the navigability of the Rio Grande River a thousand miles below the springs and small streams that are to be impounded there.

Mr. HUSTING. I know nothing of the conditions there, but I say what the United States can properly concern itself about is as far as the streams are navigable within the law, and to that extent it exercises sovereignty. I will agree with the Senator that the Government exercises sovereignty over it primarily because of navigation, but it need be blinded to all the other things that are necessarily incident to the development of navigation, but its sovereignty extends as far as the welfare of the public demands that it shall extend in connection with or incident to its development. This bill applies beyond the mere development of navigation. The bill of the Senator from Tennessee goes further than navigation. It goes to the question of regulating rates. It goes to the question of developing water power. It goes to the question of other things besides navigation. So it is generally recognized, as it is recognized here, that the sovereignty of the United States does not extend merely to the question of navigation, although that gives it its controlling power, no doubt.

I say that if the United States wants to go into the business of having its rivers and the navigation of its rivers developed, if it wants to have its water powers developed, if it wants to prevent floods—and we have a bill here proposing to appropriate a large sum of money to prevent floods—it is absolutely necessary that the United States shall not surrender any jurisdiction to any part of the waters that it extends over now under the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the United States.

For instance, as to flood prevention, going back to the reservoirs in the States where these great rivers have their rise, if dams were built across these little thoroughfares, as they call them, or little creeks, through which immense lakes are emptying out their waters, and small dams constructed, as they are already being constructed in the State that I in part represent, billions of cubic feet of water can be stored and conserved, with the result that the flood problem will be treated at its source, as it should primarily be treated, instead of at its mouth. The building of dikes and the building of dams at the mouth of the Mississippi River, or any distance above, will be absolutely insufficient to prevent a flood from sweeping them away. The only way, in my judgment, that a flood can properly be prevented is by controlling the headwaters of the stream, by establishing reservoir systems, by putting them in charge of men, under instructions to store up the water in flood time and let them out in the dry time, thus not only preventing floods, but increasing the efficiency of the water powers down below. If the headwaters of every river emptying into the Mississippi were controlled by this Government by dams and reservoirs—and it can be done at a minimum cost—and, moreover, if every dam between the source and the mouth of the Mississippi were subject to the same control and the waters of the whole watershed thus checked and stored under the direction and supervision of the Government, I think the flood problem on the Mississippi would in large part be solved.

Two reservoir systems have been established in Wisconsin under public-utility management. Conditions are better than without any control whatever, but it would be far better, in my judgment, if the State or the United States had control of them; better, I think, not only for the people but also for the water power below. But there is another thing. Even if we can not abandon the jurisdiction of the United States, vested in it by the Constitution and as construed by the Supreme Court, yet an act of this kind might be construed to be this, namely, a mere definition of a doubtful jurisdiction or perhaps the settlement of the meaning of the words that are now said to be in dispute; we then may not only restrict the scope of this bill, but we may be in danger perhaps of abandoning some of the rights that we have in these streams. What would be the result of that? It may be that some of the streams or parts of streams in Maine, Wisconsin, and Minnesota may not be used just now for navigation, but the law is now plain. If dams are built in Wisconsin or in Minnesota or in Maine, or for that matter in any other State, and the time comes when the United States may desire to make these rivers navigable, under the present jurisdiction, as defined by the Supreme Court, under the present law of the United States, the United States can remove those dams and take possession and control thereof.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the pending provision in the bill. There is a penalty, to which I referred, that if such a dam is built, the penalty of a thousand dollars is fixed in section 8, and for every month the structure is continued there is imposed a penalty of an additional thousand dollars. I think I tried to make it plain that the innocent holder or riparian owner who, following the State law enacted under State authority, tried to improve his property and to create water power for his gristmill or for his sawmill, and thought he had a right to do so upon a stream, should not be subjected to the penalty. It would be true, however, as the Senator says, that the Government might later find that to be an obstruction that ought to be removed; but such riparian owner will have incurred that penalty and be liable.

Mr. HUSTING. That illustrates the danger of the United States even permitting these things to be done by the State. The rule in Maine evidently is not the rule, as I understand it, in Wisconsin. For instance, in Wisconsin the riparian owner, while he has rights, has no right, as I understand, to build a dam across a navigable stream—a stream navigable within the meaning of the law and within the meaning of the opinion of the court without permission of the legislature or of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin again yield to me?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. There will be no dispute between the Senator and me upon that; and the law is no different in Maine. The trouble is that the Senator is using the word "navigable" as if it had a strict, definite meaning; and I should like to ask the Senator to define the word "navigable." What does he mean by the word "navigable"?

Mr. HUSTING. I will say that I understand the word "navigable" to mean what the Supreme Court of the United States has said it means.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I should like the Senator to express the meaning of the word as it is in his mind. What is a "navigable stream"?

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I should have to refer him to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the courts of the several States, although, as I understand, in short it is this: A stream is navigable that is navigable in fact, for any purpose, for the purpose of floating logs or a skiff or a rowboat; at least, that is within the meaning of the State definition of "navigable waters." I think a little different rule applies in regard to what streams are considered navigable within the commerce clause of the Constitution, although, when the two definitions are compared and analyzed, I can not see a great deal of difference in their ultimate meaning.

I say, under the present law, under the present jurisdiction of the United States, or under its present application if we do not abandon it or waive it—perhaps we can not abandon or waive it if we try; I have some doubts whether we can abandon it or waive it at all. But conceding, for the sake of the argument, that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine we would be deciding a doubtful question that we could abandon it, it would simply change the rule to this extent: Men could go in there and put up dams; and, if the time should ever come when it would be necessary or expedient for the United States to use the river for the purposes of navigation, the United States would have no right to remove the dams, at least not without compensation, and would have lost its right of way and would have to buy it back. We would practically have abandoned rights which we have always enjoyed and which never have been disputed. For one I do not think we should do that. That is a right, the value of which no living man can determine. I do not think we should take a chance that may be so far-reaching in its consequences or that we should abandon a jurisdiction and a right of control over the great waterways, the lakes, and the great waters of this country upon a mere "think-so" or "believe-so." It seems to me that the Government should be very jealous of its jurisdiction and of its control, and that it should keep in its hands and within its control all the power that the Constitution gives it, yielding, or rather delegating for a time only to the States such portion of such sovereignty as we think may be properly left to them. Even then, though there may be a divided responsibility and a divided jurisdiction for a time, laws should be passed in such a way that the State and the United States can cooperate in making these waters of the greatest advantage to the people of the State and the country at large.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin where there is any authority for the United States to regulate the water flow or the water in any of the streams? Where does he find it?

Mr. HUSTING. I find it in the Constitution and in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hold in my hand a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., p. 46), a Supreme Court decision rendered by Justice Brewer, in which he said:

> That the Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that all powers not granted are reserved to the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories, and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream——

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The decision continues:

> that the full control over those waters is vested in the State.

In view of that decision I can not see where the authority is to go into a State, especially where there is no navigable stream, and attempt to regulate or to control it.

Mr. HUSTING. Just in so far as it is necessary to control it in the interest of navigation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No. The power of the United States Government is of a restricted nature. The States have always exercised control even over obstructions to navigation until in comparatively recent years. Then there have been acts of Congress passed that prohibit the construction upon a river dams and things of that kind that would obstruct navigation.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator from Colorado, as I said before, that there appears to be a different rule applied to the term "navigable waters within a State and navigable waters under the control of the United States"; but in the last analysis you finally get down to the proposition that the United States can do anything with the waters within the borders of a State, if it is necessary to use them in the interest of navigation, either in or out of the State, provided the waters to be controlled by the United States empty into interstate waters.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You can pass laws and you can enforce them if nobody objects; but the power does not exist there; it never was granted. The Senator can not show a constitutional provision that authorizes it. This decision says it is within the jurisdiction of the State, and for over a hundred years it has been administered by the State without any law of Congress with relation to the matter.

Mr. HUSTING. So far as my knowledge of the subject goes, I believe that the United States has always asserted such power whenever it felt like doing so. It has never been questioned; the Supreme Court has recognized it; and I take it for granted that a practice that has obtained for so many years, a rule that has been asserted by the United States for so many years, is founded on some good, substantial basis. The decision read by the Senator from Colorado is qualified by the words "except to preserve or improve the navigability of the streams." Those qualifying words show to my mind that in the last analysis the State's right is subordinate to such jurisdiction as the United States is to assert at some time or times as it cares to assert it.

The United States some time ago withdrew from public entry 70,000 acres of land for the very purpose of establishing a reservoir in northern Wisconsin. It was heavily timbered. Subsequently it was put back upon the market; the timber was cut off, and the United States has to-day a reservation of 70,000 acres of land for the purpose of establishing a reservoir controlling the waters of the Chippewa and Wisconsin Rivers. In order to preserve or promote navigation or to prevent floods the United States has the undoubted right to create reservoirs at the sources of the streams, and if it has that right it can control the stream flow and that carries with it necessarily the control and regulation of the whole stream.

This is a very important proposition. Of course, if it is the purpose of this bill merely to improve the navigable rivers of the United States, without care or regard for the water powers incidentally created by the improvements and the intent is to turn these powers over to individuals and corporations for their own use, then, of course, the bill in part accomplishes this, but only in part if it restricts its application to little stretches in rivers and abandons a control which will make a broad and comprehensive development of our water powers unproductive if not impossible.

But if it is the purpose of the United States to turn to account the great resources of the country as regards waterways, navigation, and water powers for the advantage and benefit of the whole people, then the law should be as broad in its application and scope as it is possible to make it.

As I said a little while ago, this bill, it is claimed by its sponsors, is a good thing. I do not think so, and if I thought that this bill would pass in its present form or without vital and radical changes, I would think now its application and scope far too broad, even with the amendment of the Senator from Maine; in fact, in that event, I would like to see it defeated entirely. But if the Senators who support it think it is a good bill it would seem that they at least would insist that it carry the widest scope and application possible.

There is no question, however, that this amendment would restrict it to a very small percentage of the navigable waters of the country, if "navigable waters" are defined as they are now sought to be defined by this amendment. Not only that but you will restrict it to the very part of the waters where there is the least potential water-power development.

The engineers, as I understand, divide rivers such as I have described in Wisconsin in three parts. The upper third or reservoir part, the middle third, as they call it, which is the water-power part, and the lower third, or the navigable part for commercial purpose. It is that little lower portion of the river which is navigable only for commercial purposes. The reservoirs are where the water is stored. The waters empty out and gradually with the fall of the ground gain in volume and momentum until they constitute good water-power rivers, tumbling down the rapids and down the falls to the southern part of the State. That is where your water-power development has got to be done, if at all. The upper reaches of the river—fully one-third of it—are not navigable, although tremendous volumes of water pour through them, because that part is fast water and consists mostly of rapids and falls. That is, however, where the water-power portion of it is. You can not run a boat down such rivers, in such parts, which draws 2 feet or, for that matter, even 1 foot of water. When you get down to the lower third the fall of the river is very slight, but deep, and there it is navigable. The country is flat. The energy of the water is gone, because it has reached again a level part of the State. So I presume that in the Mississippi the less the fall and the less the energy the less it is adapted to water-power development; you can not get the head there that you can up where the water is swift and where the falls and rapids are frequent.

Now, I believe that if we are to pass a bill for the comprehensive development of our streams we must control the headwaters and the mouths of such streams, and in order to do that with any degree of success we must control the reaches of fast water in between. This we manifestly can not do, either for the purpose of improvement of navigation or for the proper development of water power to its utmost capacity, unless we exercise jurisdiction and control over some parts of streams and give private control of the other parts. The surrender of any part of the sovereignty of the United States over any part of its navigable waters is of such serious and far-reaching importance and may lead to such grave results that I feel the amendment should be defeated.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LIPPITT. I present a resolution of the Senate of the Rhode Island General Assembly, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, ETC.,
IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January Session, A. D. 1916.

Resolution of the Senate of the Rhode Island General Assembly urging upon the Congress of the United States of America the duty of adequately increasing the military and naval forces of this Government.

Whereas in view of the terrible loss of human lives and of the ruthless methods that have frequently characterized the present European war, we may realize in some measure the distress and destruction that would be wrought upon our own land should this Nation become involved in war with any of the great powers; and

Whereas on several occasions the Secretary of State of the United States has made demands that certain fundamental principles of decency and humanity be observed by the participants in this war, demands that this Government is notoriously unable to enforce; and

Whereas it is our sacred duty to preserve inviolate this Republic with its Constitution and traditions of justice, humanity, and liberty: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the honorable senate urges upon the President and Congress of the United States the immediate adoption of a definite and continuing policy which shall largely augment our trained and equipped military and naval forces, so that this Republic may be adequately prepared to resist invasion, to protect the lives and possessions of its citizens, and to enforce its reasonable and humane demands; and also be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the Members of the Congress of the United States from this State, with instructions to present them in their respecive houses.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 28, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Increase, O God our heavenly Father, our faith and confidence in Thee as the source of all that is pure, inspiring, and holy, that our intellectual, moral, and spiritual life may increase. Time is evanescent; character alone survives its wreck, and enables us to meet the duties and responsibilities of the now and the then. It is not what we are but what we long to be that moves the world to larger life and nobler service to Thee and our fellow men under the spiritual influence of the world's great Exemplar, our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 26, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1916.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I beg leave to advise you as a member of the subcommittee from the Committee on the Judiciary investigating charges of impeachment against H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for the southern district of New York, I have been called to the city of New York to hear evidence there, and I therefore most respectfully ask leave of absence during the necessary continuance of that investigation in New York.

Very truly, WARREN GARD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the leave requested in this letter will be granted.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This is District day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago to-day, which was the last District day, the juvenile court bill went over as the unfinished business. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has it in charge, and he is unavoidably absent to-day. He has some necessary amendments to the bill. Therefore I do not wish to call it up, but wish to have it go over as the unfinished business for the next District day.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, two paragraphs of the bill read by the Clerk, one on page 3219 of the RECORD, near the bottom of the second column, and on page 3216, in the second column, have been transposed. I ask that the Clerk be authorized to change them to their proper position, as they appear in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. As the Clerk has them in the bill, are the paragraphs in the proper place?

Mr. MOON. Yes. What I desire is a transposition of the paragraphs as they are printed in the RECORD. As they appear now, each printed paragraph is out of its place, and what is said in relation to it does not apply to it, and therefore in their present form the paragraphs do not make sense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee does not wish to have the bill corrected. He wishes to have the RECORD corrected, does he not?

Mr. MOON. That is all.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman seeking to change what the committee did?

Mr. MOON. No; not at all.

Mr. BENNET. The committee offered an amendment as I caught it, changing these rates in three different paragraphs, and as the committee changed them, as I read them, they raised the rate paid to the railroads $6,070,000 more than what the gentleman from Tennessee stated.

Mr. MOON. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. The gentleman does not understand what we are talking about. I am not talking about the amount of the raise. The gentleman may be $5,000,000 off on that, but what we are talking about is that a paragraph in the bill which was read first appears last, and a paragraph which was read last appears first, and is simply transposed in the printing.

Mr. BENNET. Simply a transposition of the paragraphs?

Mr. MOON. That is all. Unless the paragraphs are put in their proper places, the context does not make sense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not here when the gentleman made his original statement, but I wish to say that immediately after the adjournment of the session on Saturday I was informed that there had been an error in the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee as to certain rates of pay, and that it would involve probably $4,000,000 in addition to what had already been granted to the railroads. This morning I have been advised——

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as I have already said to the gentleman from New York, that I am not seeking to change any amendment. The gentleman's statement as to the amount of the increase, however, is probably not correct. What I am seeking to do is to have two sections of the bill transposed in the RECORD—one put in the place of the other—in the order in which they were actually read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is only a question of doing that which is legislatively right and keeping the RECORD straight. I did not finish the statement I was making to the gentleman, which was that, having been informed on Saturday that there was a mistake of over $4,000,000, I have been advised this morning that the difference in favor of the railroads is over $6,000,000.

Mr. MOON. In what?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the amount they will receive.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is mistaken about that. We will see to that later.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Tennessee is entirely correct in his request. He wishes to have two paragraphs of the bill transposed in the RECORD. All he wishes is a transposition of the paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report (No. 266) from the Ways and Means Committee to accompany the bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to produce revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913. I ask that it be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina presents a report to accompany House bill 11471, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from North Carolina state when the bill will be likely to be taken up, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope to take it up on Thursday next. The legislative bill may probably be in the way, but if we can make some arrangement I would like to take it up on that day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How long will it take, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. KITCHIN. About a day.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I think we have been promised recognition for the purpose of calling up the immigration bill right after the conclusion of the legislative bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood that the rule for the immigration bill was that it should not interfere with revenue bills.

Mr. BURNETT. There is nothing of that kind in the rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. It will not interfere with the gentleman's bill because we will have it up while the legislative bill is pending, and it will only make a day's delay, so that the gentleman will get his bill through just as soon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should take up anything that will interfere with the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, they have been three or four months getting the appropriation bills ready, and I do not think there is anything more important than the immigration bill.

The SPEAKER. The report presented by the gentleman from North Carolina is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I present from the Committee on Ways and Means a report (No. 267) to accompany the bill (S. 4506) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880.

The SPEAKER. It is ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RAINEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all pro forma amendments will be withdrawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, at the end of line 6, insert:

"And make report to Congress of all cases where such special contracts are made, and the terms and reasons therefor."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This provision is for the purpose of taking care of the short-line railroads, is it?

Mr. MOON. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. NORTON. Where the cost of carrying the mail is altogether out of proportion to what is allowed the companies ordinarily under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MOON. It applies not only to the short lines, but to all railroads.

Mr. NORTON. Where unusual conditions in relation to carrying the mails prevail?

Mr. MOON. Yes. I will say this to the gentleman about the short lines. There is a difference in the earnings, in fact, under the present law on the short lines and the long lines. The short lines usually have apartment cars. The Government puts apartment cars on the short lines, while on the long lines they have full railway post-office cars and storage cars. Where they have those, the Government pays for the weight, and also pays for the space, because it pays for the full railway post-office car and for the storage car by space, and for carrying mail by weight, but the little roads suffer this disadvantage: They have to furnish a quarter of a car or half a car and do not get any pay at all for space, simply for weight. That, of course, makes a very great injustice to the short lines under the present law, but they seem to be dominated and controlled entirely by the long lines, and they are making a fight here against their own interests, in my judgment.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that in my State there is a line about 100 miles long, owned largely by farmers in that tributary territory, and the president of the company writes me that while they are now carrying the mails for a great deal less than actual cost, that this proposed legislation will mean a much greater loss to his company. I take it that this provision in the bill will permit the Postmaster General to make a special contract with this and other such short-line railroads.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. I observe here that there is no appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. MOON. Roads with 51 per cent of the mileage could appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NORTON. Would they have a right to appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOON. I will tell the gentleman where I think his friend makes a mistake in saying he is not paid enough. He is not getting any pay now for the space he furnishes the Government. The Government actually takes his space for nothing, and pays him for the dead weight. If the gentleman will look into this measure closely, he will find this, that in proportion the rate given for the movement of cars, apartment cars, is greater than that for full railroad post-office cars.

Mr. NORTON. I understand that.

Mr. MOON. Then there is an initial and a terminal charge, and they make frequent trips and they get that charge on every trip, and also get the space pay on every trip whether it is occupied or not. Where they make frequent trips they may earn two or three times as much as they ought to, and it may be that the power of the department will have to be exercised in order to limit the number of trips, in order to prevent too much pay, and then, where the space is small, the gentleman will see that very heavy pay is granted them on the pouch pay. I think, taking the additional rate, mileage, pouch pay, initial and trip terminal charges, and all, most of the little roads will get more than they are getting now, but still some of them will not get as much as they ought to, perhaps, and therefore this section.

Mr. NORTON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if the Postmaster General should in his judgment find a special contract should not be made to one of these short-line railroads, that railroad would have the right to take the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOON. No. I intended to convey this idea, that under the law, as proposed, they will get a little more than they do under the present law.

Mr. NORTON. That I realize is the gentleman's conclusion on his own construction of this legislation.

Mr. MOON. But still they might not get as much as they are entitled to, and, therefore, there is a provision here under which they may go to the Postmaster General to secure more pay. The gentleman desires to know whether, if the Postmaster General and the road can not agree, the road has the right to appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MOON. They have that right only where 51 per cent of the road mileage agrees upon it and asks for the change.

Mr. FINLEY. Fifty-one per cent of the total mileage.

Mr. MOON. Fifty-one per cent of the road mileage in the United States.

Mr. NORTON. That would not give a short-line railroad or the short-line railroads of the country the right to appeal at all.

Mr. MOON. Somebody has to settle this matter. The Postmaster General has the right of contract. These gentlemen are getting the benefit of the general law, and it is not thought necessary to have two or three persons from whom to appeal, one to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman accept an amendment providing that a railroad having a mileage of not to exceed 250 miles might have the right to appeal from the decision of the Postmaster General to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOON. That is unjust to the Government and to the Postmaster General and everybody else. There are thousands of railroads in the country; every one of them would have appeals pending. You have to have some confidence in your executive officer, the Postmaster General. You can not assume the Postmaster General is going to do wrong.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman speaks of short-line railroads. About what mileage does the gentleman mean by a short line?

Mr. MOON. I do not know what the gentleman means. There is no such thing, legally speaking, as a short line or a long line, but we speak of them as such.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more just to answer a question or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Dakota may have two minutes additional. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Let the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] have the two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the gentleman say that a road that has 200 miles would be termed a short-line railroad?

Mr. MOON. I do not know; it might be and it might not be. When we speak of short lines we generally speak of little independent roads and not a road that is part of a big system, a transcontinental road or one like the Southern line—a trunk line—but a little independent line not connected with or owned by another system is what we call a short line.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman stated that in most instances these short-line roads would get more under this bill than under the old bill?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman evidently has some figures on that. Could the gentleman state definitely as to about how much more, on an average?

Mr. MOON. No; it depends upon conditions. Now, for instance, there is one short-line road running from the State of Tennessee into North Carolina. It makes five or six trips a day. By reason of the frequency of these trips, its initial and terminal charges, rates, and pouch charges on that road it is conceded that for its service it will get three times as much as it ought to have; but the Postmaster General will have to correct that by order, permitting the mail to be carried only on one or two of its trips instead of three, four, or six times, as the case may be. Again, there are a number of little roads beyond the Rocky Mountains where it takes all day to make a tedious trip and an expensive trip. They do not carry a great deal of mail and they are really operating at a loss. The space is taken from them, the Government pays nothing for it, and the weight does not amount to a great deal. Under these rates they get pay for space, whether used or not, and that will be a great advantage to them, and in many instances they will be benefited and in many instances they may not be; and this bill provides for a contract in order to see that justice is done.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill that was passed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has again expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for two minutes, just to answer some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has never been recognized. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill that passed in the Sixty-third Congress for railway-mail pay did not have that provision in it about the right of a railroad to appeal to the Postmaster General.

Mr. MOON. No; it did not. That bill that passed this House at that time was not finally passed for the reason stated frequently here, but it was practically the same bill excepting these rates.

Mr. HARRISON. What is the difference in the rates?

Mr. MOON. I will answer the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. HARRISON. Are the rates higher in this bill than the one we passed in the Sixty-third Congress?

Mr. MOON. The higher rates are in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. There is an additional right to the railroads to appeal to the Postmaster General to have the rates fixed, and if they are dissatisfied with that, then there is another provision in this bill, that was not in the bill that passed the Sixty-third Congress, giving the right to the railroads, if 51 per cent of them so desire, to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is that true?

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that there have been two or three commissions on the subject, two or three investigations made by the Post Office Department, and the commission that fixed the rates that are now in this bill was the last commission to pass upon the question, known as the Bourne Commission. We have placed in this bill the figures of that commission, and for the benefit of those gentlemen who want the intervention of the Interstate Commerce Commission I will say that the statistician of that commission, the man who will make the figures on this matter if it should go to them, was the man who helped to make the figures in the Bourne report.

Mr. HARRISON. I see.

Mr. MOON. Now, the first bill, the original bill a year ago, carried in the aggregate for the whole roads of something over a half million dollars more money than was carried under the general law. This bill, with the Bourne Commission rates and amendments which have been made here, I am advised by those who are competent to determine the question, experts in the department, will carry from three to four million dollars more than the previous bill carried for the railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request—to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The reason for placing this provision, beginning line 3, page 42, of the bill, extending down to the end of line 6, permitting the Postmaster General to make special contracts with railroad companies, can be illustrated by a short-line railroad in the far West. Under existing law the highest pay that the department can give to that railroad is very small, indeed, and the road refuses to carry the mail at those rates because it could not afford to give the service for the compensation that it would receive under existing law. The department was compelled to let out that contract to the star route service. They did so, and pay, as I remember, something like three times as much for the star route service right along the line of the railroad as the railroads can receive under existing law for performing the same service, a much more expeditious service and, of course, of much more efficient service.

Therefore it was thought wise and proper that this provision, providing that the Postmaster General may make special contracts in cases like that where the conditions are extraordinary, should be made. And while I have the floor I will say that I have repeatedly stated that the short-line railroads have been taken care of in this bill. I have a letter here from the Second Assistant Postmaster General in which it is stated that in South Carolina the Carolina & Northwestern, from Edgemont, N. C., to Chester, S. C., an independent road, under the present law received as compensation and pay for its services in carrying the mail $8,833.19. I state frankly that that is insufficient pay for the service performed. Under this bill, as estimated by the experts at the department, the road will receive $11,162.88, or something like 40 per cent more than it receives now. So this is an illustration of what the short-line railroads will receive in the way of increased compensation and some of the benefits that will accrue to them. Another short-line railroad in South Carolina has been carrying the mail for only a year or two. While we all know that when a road is newly opened for the transportation of the mail, the short-line roads in particular, they go in under existing law at a compensation of $42.75 per annum per mile. Under this law that road now receives $1,101.24.

Now, on a 3-foot space basis they would receive less, namely, $793.76; but it is estimated by the president of the road, and I believe there is no question about it, that 7-foot space will be required on the Alcolu Railroad, and on a basis of 7-foot space the compensation will be $1,587.76. So that these three instances that I have recited, one of the short-line railroads in the far West and these two in South Carolina with which I am familiar, go to prove the contention of the committee and the Members who have made speeches here in reference to the compensation that the short-line railroads will receive. They are getting pay under existing law, but they did not receive sufficient compensation for the services performed. We have endeavored to take care of them and to provide a way by which they can receive proper compensation, and I believe we have done so.

The letter I referred to is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, February 26, 1916.

Hon. D. E. FINLEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to the request contained in your letter of the 24th instant, left with me by your secretary, I have to inform you that the department estimates that the compensation which would be received by the Alcolu Railroad Co. and the Carolina & Northwestern Railroad Co. under the provisions of the railway mail pay section of the bill H. R. 10484 would be as follows:

Alcolu Railroad Co. (service stated at present as route 120056, from Olanta to Alcolu, S. C.):

Present pay	$1,101.24
Estimated pay under H. R. 10484	793.76

This provides 3 feet of space in each of the four trains operated by that company. If conditions warranted 7 feet of space, the compensation would be double the above amount, or $1,587.52.

Carolina & Northwestern Railroad Co. (service stated at present as route 118203, Edgemont, N. C., to Chester, S. C.):

Present pay	$8,833.19
Estimated pay under H. R. 10484	11,162.88

This provides for one round trip of 30-foot car between Edgemont and Chester; one round trip closed-pouch service, 3-foot unit, between Hickory and Lenoir, N. C., daily, except Sunday; one single trip, 3-foot unit, daily, except Sunday, Lincolnton to Hickory; one round trip, 3-foot unit, Sundays only, between Hickory and Lenoir; and one single trip, 3-foot unit, Sundays only, Chester to Clover, S. C., and Gastonia to Maiden, N. C.

It will be seen from these figures that the proposed bill will slightly decrease the compensation received by the Alcolu Railroad Co., but materially increases that received by the Carolina & Northwestern Railroad. With respect to the former, your attention is invited to that provision of the proposed law which provides that the Postmaster General may make special contracts with railroad companies for the transportation of mails where, in his judgment, the conditions warrant the application of higher rates than those therein specified. While the department is not prepared to say at this time whether the compensation which will be warranted under the new bill will be adequate, the provision referred to offers an opportunity of making further readjustments in such compensation if it should be warranted by the facts.

Yours, very truly,

A. A. FISHER,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster General.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on Saturday, in connection with this bill, an amendment was adopted limiting the weight of the parcel to 50 pounds. We are all, of course, advised that under the law as it exists the Postmaster General on filing a petition with the Interstate Commerce Commission, just like a railroad, just like an express company, is given the right to have the conditions of the Parcel Post Service determined from time to time. Congress put the parcel-post transportation agency exactly where it put the express and railroad transportation agency with reference to transportation.

Gentlemen of the committee, in every country that has a parcel post the weight limit runs from 100 pounds and up. In Germany it is 110 pounds; Belgium, 132 pounds; Switzerland, 110 pounds; Hungary, 110 pounds; Russia, 120 pounds; Roumania, 110 pounds; Luxemburg, 110 pounds; Sweden, 110 pounds; and Norway, 110 pounds. Because in this country the introduction of that service has been delayed for some reason or other for 40 years and its development intrusted to what I may fairly call the most expert transportation tribunal in the world, the Interstate Commerce Commission, is no reason why on insufficient, superficial reasoning Congress should now step in and repeal a fundamental provision of the parcel-post law passed some three or four years ago.

The reasoning presented by the gentleman who took responsibility for the amendment was that the parcel-post traffic was diverting some of the railroads' freight traffic from their line through the parcel-post agency, and that they were losing by such diversion. Of course a statement like that can only have a value measured by the amount of study given the detailed facts. I can say this in answer to it: The parcel-post rate for 150 miles is a cent a pound. That is $20 a ton. I will ask the gentleman to keep these facts in mind. The average rate received by the railroads of this country for the carriage of freight is $1.90 a ton. The parcel-post rate is something over ten times the average freight rate.

Now, it seems, Mr. Chairman, if there happens to be a railroad in this country that can not move freight at ten times the average rate received by the railroad, that is their misfortune and should not be made the misfortune of the people of this country by striking down the parcel-post law. For that is what it means, and it means nothing less. The express companies are under certain limitations, limitations which it is economically impossible for them to remove. They can not reach the farms of this country. I will ask you for a moment to consider what that statement means. Some 25,000,000 people live on the farms, away from the reach of the express service. We are actually maintaining a million miles of rural routes over which the Postal Service can conduct this transportation and no other human agency could do it within the limits of economic policy. To fix a weight limit of this kind or any limit upon the rational, gradual, careful development of this Parcel Post Service up to the limit that other countries enjoy is to say to the farmer, to say to the country merchant, "You are never to have a parcel post like that enjoyed in other countries and, moreover, you are never to have an express service either." I want to ask the gentlemen of this committee whether they really feel that they are better qualified to deal with this question than the Interstate Commerce Commission. I know that no man, of course, is so vain or reckless of his opinion. And yet it is with the Interstate Commerce Commission that this power of development, this power of construction, is placed in the last analysis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OAKEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, that is the plain, the economic, and the institutional reasoning on this subject. Perhaps gentlemen will remember that when this law was passed Congress inserted rates, but it put in the administrative clause which this amendment in part destroys, and let us see how much has been done for the public service through that administrative clause. A 10-pound parcel from Baltimore to New York, under the statutory rates fixed by this body, would have cost 6 cents for the first pound and 4 cents for each additional pound. That would be a rate of 42 cents on a 10-pound parcel, actually and literally four times the whole cost of service.

I make that statement deliberately, and can submit to this House the particular facts upon which it is based. But under this administrative clause that is stricken down in this respect by the amendment. The Postmaster General, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, reduced that rate from 4 to 1 cent a pound, and the rate for a 10-pound parcel from Baltimore to New York, the second zone, is 14 cents, as against 42 cents under the statutory rate.

What did the statutory rate mean? It meant that this body, of course without any conscious purpose so to do, had put over on the people a paper parcel post, a fake rate. Nobody would ever pay 42 cents to send a package by parcel post when they could send it for 32 cents by the express company. They might as well have said, when they adopted those rates at 4 cents a pound for 150 miles, that the weight limit should be 4 pounds or 5 pounds, because beyond 4 or 5 pounds nobody could afford to ship by parcel post. That is another incident going to show that this is a transportation subject that requires treatment by those institutions of the Government competent and designed to handle transportation subjects, and not only competent to handle them but to handle them from year to year under plastic conditions, to enable them not only to make improvements from time to time but, if a mistake is made, to correct that mistake before serious damage is done.

A clause was put in that bill requiring the use of what is called a distinctive stamp. You could not put an ordinary postage stamp on the parcel. You had to walk down town a mile or two, no matter how trivial the parcel, and get a specially designed stamp for that purpose. It was an awful nuisance, and in two or three months' experience it was found to be so. On appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission and full investigation the commission struck out the use of the distinctive stamp. It was valueless, anyhow. Some man in the other body thought that by this distinctive stamp you could ascertain how much revenue you were getting from the parcel post, utterly oblivious of the fact that the stamp was used on all fourth-class matter, new and old, and that several hundred millions of old fourth-class parcels were moving in addition to the new fourth-class parcels, and the distinctive stamp was no indication at all of what revenue was received from the new service, because of its confusion with the old service. Of course, it gave no indication at all of the expense of the handling of the parcel, and I am going to come to that point in this appeal to you gentlemen, if my time limit permits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to pages 38 and 39.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, what is pending before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. A request to give to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] as much time as he needs to conclude his argument.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

Mr. LONDON. Make it 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. What amendment is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. A pro forma amendment.

Mr. ROUSE. I will ask that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Maryland be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Will that end it?

Mr. LEWIS. No; that will not end it. This fight will not end until the parcel-post law is saved.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to know simply whether there will be any further requests for extension.

Mr. LEWIS. That will be all.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I was going to make a request, but I had better wait until the gentleman from Maryland concludes his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Maryland have 10 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, it so happens—of course, without any realization, I take it, by those who propose this amendment—that the parcel post, while it pays even on the smallest weight, except, perhaps, the 1 ounce, which brings only 1 cent postage—that rate probably does not pay the cost of service—that from 2 cents up it does pay the cost of service, and a system of profit sets in and grows larger and larger with the weight of the parcel.

I am going to give you an illustration. Something was said in the remarks here on Saturday about the parcels post not paying. I can not quote the remarks, because I do not have them clear enough in my recollection, but that is an opinion rather sedulously cultivated in some quarters. It is, however, the worst kind of misinformation, indeed, if it represents anything of information at all and not a mere prejudice.

I am going to speak now of the most expensive parcels which the post office handles. I refer to the parcel that weighs on the average more than 3 pounds, and on that account has got to require a vehicle—a wagon or auto—delivery in the towns and cities. The average weight of that parcel was 5½ pounds. And let me say here in parenthesis, gentlemen, no express company has ever known as much about its parcel business as the Post Office Department knows about its parcel business. That results from the fact that six censuses of the parcels traffic have already been taken, for two weeks in April and two weeks in October of every year since its inauguration. That census dis-closes not only how many parcels have been moved from an ounce and up but into what zones they have gone, and it also discloses at what point on the average the parcel requires vehicle delivery, that point being 3 pounds and up. It discloses, moreover, the cost of conducting the service.

First, you have the cost of vehicle delivery. That began in 1913 at 39 mills per parcel, about 4 cents for all forms of vehicle delivery. But last year the Postal Department had worked it down until it was only 28 mills, a reduction of 25 per cent in the cost of the delivery of the parcel. It discloses, too, how far that parcel moved. The average parcel of a pound and up moved 375 miles on the railroads of this country.

That, gentlemen, is information that the express companies have never had. They do not know, have never known, and nobody knows, how far on the average a package carried by express moves in this country. The census shows the cost of clerical hire, which they find to be about 3½ mills per parcel. They know about the cost of handling this parcel on railroads for railway post office attendance. That amounts to a half cent per parcel.

The fact is that, putting all the actual expenses together and then adding an arbitrary equal to the average cost of moving an average piece of mail, it cost the Post Office last year less than 5 cents to handle this weighty parcel, while the express companies have found that it costs them 24 cents to handle their average parcels. But, allowing for the extra weight and for some extra services granted by the express companies, it is obvious from this experience that the Post Office Department has attained such economy and such efficiency in the handling of these parcels that it could do the express business at half the cost to the companies now conducting it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman assert that the Government of the United States, paying twice the wages to its employees that are paid by the express companies, can do for 5 cents what it costs the express companies 24 cents to do?

Mr. LEWIS. I do, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. The Government does pay its men better. It gives them better hours and it gets better service. The fact is a matter of demonstration, and the gentleman ought to know it. It is a matter of demonstration that the Post Office Department is handling these shipments at this time at less than half the cost to the express companies.

Mr. MADDEN. This would be at about one-fifth of the cost.

Mr. LEWIS. But when you add the pick-up service, and when you add the collection of the rate from the consignee, and when you add something for their larger-sized parcel you would have about 12 cents for the post against 24 cents which it costs the express company. The gentleman has really put his finger on the spot in this matter, and I am going to ask the patience of this House on so serious a matter as this, and am going to give the explanations. You want to know why the Post Office Department can do this work better and cheaper than the express companies. What does the express company do with the parcels?

First. It ascertains the rate to be paid, a very complicated task, which is simple in the Post Office Department.

Second. It makes out a waybill.

Third. It copies the waybill into a record of shipments "forwarded."

Fourth. It copies the same into a record of shipments "received."

Fifth. It makes a statement of "shipment sent" to the auditor.

Sixth. It makes a statement of "shipment received" for the auditor.

Seventh. The auditor checks the waybills against the record of the sending agent.

Eighth. The auditor checks the same against the record of the receiving agent.

Ninth. In case of through waybills, the previous items are all repeated.

Tenth. The auditor makes a division of the percentages going to the express company and to the railway or railways.

Eleventh. In case of through waybills the auditor makes like divisions of percentages between the express companies and the railways.

Here are 11 processes which are completely replaced by simply putting the postage stamp on the parcel. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman elaborated on all the items of expense as ascertained by expert clerks of the Post Office Department in connection with the movement of the parcels. Does the work done by these clerks in any sense compare with the records just read by the gentleman?

Mr. LEWIS. They do not have that work to do.

Mr. MADDEN. How do they get the records that the gentleman describes—about what it has cost for each part of the work done in the handling of the parcel in the Post Office Department?

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman by his question discloses the fact that he has not read the frequent reports made in detail by the Post Office Department of these censuses that have been conducted.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not a fair answer to the question.

Mr. LEWIS. I will give the gentleman an answer.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman made a statement. I was asking him about his statement.

Mr. LEWIS. I will give the gentleman the answer. I have just explained it to the House, and you can get it from the Post Office Department. It was sent to your office. Of course you are too busy to read it, but the report of that census is in print. It covers some 50 pages of statistics and shows for every city what it has cost to handle a parcel by the vehicle delivery. It shows what it has cost in every city for clerical attention, and then, to make things whole, I add to these costs a miscellaneous item to equal the average cost of all mail pieces, and the cost is a fraction less than 5 cents.

Mr. MADDEN. What I asked the gentleman was, How did the cost of doing the things that he has described compare with the cost of doing the things which he said were eliminated in connection with the Postal Service?

Mr. LEWIS. I understand, and I answer the gentleman in the utmost relevancy and candor. It certainly costs the express company——

Mr. MADDEN. I want the gentleman to understand that I am only asking for information. I do not want to get outside, extraneous matter.

Mr. LEWIS. I will give the gentleman the information. A detailed catalogue of the expenses of the express company in handling its parcels shows that outside of railway pay it cost a little over 24 cents. Very well; of that 24 cents the details show that about 10 to 12 cents are consumed for accounting and clerical and other expenses that are all eliminated by the postage stamp. The Post Office Department has one instrumentality that is unique among economic agencies. It is the wonderful postage stamp. It is a system of accounting that is now taking care of $300,000,000 of revenue. Not only that; it is an accounting that tags every letter and piece of mail wherever it may go on this planet, and some 20,000,000,000 of them moved last year. If they were handled as the express company finds it necessary to handle its parcels, it would have cost the Post Office as much to run its business as it costs the railroads to run their business. These are extraordinary statements, but the Post Office is the most extraordinary business agency in the world.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I want you to pause before it is too late in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to conclude this matter, but I can take advantage of the rules later on.

Mr. OAKEY. Mr. Chairman, just a word for information. I am interested in this particular phase of the bill because of the latitude that I think has been given the Postmaster General in the short-haul mail service in my State. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee if this does give the Postmaster General sufficient extra power and latitude to arrange with the trolley service, for instance, for a little increase of technical advantages in the service?

The reason I ask the question is that in my district within a few miles of the great trunk lines of transportation is a little, lively manufacturing community, commercial and agricultural, Unionville, Conn., by name, that, on account of the fact that there is a difference between the Postmaster General's department and the railroad service, has been getting for a year or a year and a half very bad and incompetent postal service. This is a lively, up-to-date little community nestling among the New England hills which has a half hour and hour trolley service, splendid macadam roads, and a particularly inefficient steam service. There are no perpendicular landscapes to cross or dismal swamps to go through, and yet, because of a technical difference between the Postmaster General's department and the trolley service, it has been transferred to the steam service, and that service has gone back in this town until it might be called a relic of the Dark Ages. They are getting their mail at 10.30 in the morning, and letters have to be ready to be mailed at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

I came to Washington to see the department, and while I was treated very courteously, I was referred to the post-office inspectors' service. After three months' delay they reported that it was impracticable. Now, the railroad-trolley people tell me that the difference between the Post Office Department and the officials of that company is just this—1 cent additional per mile and a maximum of six bags on a trolley car, and terminal service by the Post Office Department rather than by the railroad.

The Postmaster General informed me that he had not the power or authority under the law to increase this expense to this town. Therefore I want to say to the distinguished chairman that this little community has been receiving all this time almost an impossible service when by very little increase they could have a half hour or an hour's service. I want to ask the distinguished chairman if this bill will give the Postmaster General sufficient latitude and authority, which he ought to have, to improve the service in such a community as this?

Mr. MOON. I think it does fully. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of correcting a mistake that was made, I ask unanimous consent to return to pages 38 and 39 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to pages 38 and 39 of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the purpose?

Mr. MOON. On pages 38 and 39, when we were making the corrections Saturday, I believe in order to put into the bill the rates provided by the commission rather than the rates that had been agreed upon in the last Congress by the Post Office Committee, the amounts were changed so as to meet, it was thought then, the rates of the Bourne Commission; but the mistake was made in using the language of the old bill in that connection rather than the Bourne bill. The result of it was that when we came to figure it out we placed in the bill as an initial and terminal rate not the amount that was desired by the Bourne Commission as a combined and initial terminal rate, but we have given double that amount.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason that the gentleman asks to return; but what is the amendment?

Mr. MOON. To go back to pages 38 and 39 and correct the amendment in accordance with the desire of the committee.

Mr. MANN. To correct it how?

Mr. MOON. The amendment will be this:

Strike out lines 24 to 26, inclusive, on page 38, and insert:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Strike out lines 5 to 9, inclusive, on page 39, and insert:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2.75 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and $2 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

Strike out lines 12 to 14, inclusive, on page 39, and insert:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

I will ask unanimous consent that the change be made in accordance with that statement.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I object, because the gentleman from Tennessee has not got his amendments correct now. Let the gentleman put the amendments in writing.

Mr. MOON. The amendments are in writing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the first paragraph the gentleman from Tennessee refers to a combined rate, and in the last paragraph he refers to a single rate, and that would of itself make confusion.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman is going to correct the language to conform to the recommendation of the joint commission, why not use the identical language that the joint commission recommended?

Mr. MOON. So far as we have agreed upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the gentleman's amendment is not the language contained in the report of the joint commission.

Mr. MOON. Read the language of the joint commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have it here. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post-office car service, a terminal charge of $8.50 for each round trip, or $4.25 for each single trip, of a 60-foot car, irrespective of the distance run and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 21 cents per mile run.

For 30-foot railway post-office apartment-car service, a terminal charge of $5.50 for each round trip, or $2.75 for each single trip, of a 30-foot apartment car, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 11 cents per mile run.

For 15-foot railway post-office apartment-car service, a terminal charge of $4 for each round trip, or $2 for each single trip, of a 15-foot apartment car irrespective of distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 6 cents per mile run.

For closed-pouch service, when a 3-foot unit is authorized, a terminal charge of 50 cents for a round trip, or 25 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 1½ cents per mile for the authorized number of miles. When a 7-foot unit is authorized a terminal charge of $1 for a round trip, or 50 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 3 cents per mile for the authorized number of miles.

Then follows the provision as to rates for storage cars. The difficulty with the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is that he is trying to annex to the bill, framed on a different policy, phraseology that does not gibe with the recommendations of the joint commission. If you are going to follow the joint commission's recommendation, as you stated is the proposal of the committee, then I would suggest that you use the identical language, so as to avoid confusion in interpretation. As it is in the bill, it appears there is given to the railroads double the amount that was recommended by the so-called Bourne Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the chairman that, as the committee is following the recommendations of the joint commission, they use the identical language.

Mr. MOON. It is as to these rates only that the committee is following the Bourne Commission report, and as to nothing else. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] withdraw his objection?

Mr. BENNET. I will if I can get a little time.

Mr. MOON. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BENNET. Not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. MOON. We will not object to that.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say to the chairman of the Post Office Committee that it is true that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads agreed to report in the bill the Bourne Commission rates, and these variations from the Bourne Commission's rates must be due to error in drawing the bill. But there is one omission bearing on the rates that I can not understand to be an error. The Bourne Commission rate provided that they should be as specified, but the railroad companies under that plan were relieved from carrying the mails from the post office to the railroads, and it expressly provides that the pay shall be exclusive of carrying the mail to the post offices from the railroads. The bill as reported provides that the railroad companies shall carry the mails from the post offices to the railroad stations, except where the Postmaster General, in his discretion, shall relieve them of that duty. That provision will be found on page 40, in lines 13 to 20. That is a variation from the motion which I understood was agreed to in the committee.

Mr. MOON. But the gentleman will recollect that we did not agree in the committee to the Bourne proposition except as to these rates.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but the Bourne Commission rates are exclusive of the cost of transporting the mail to the station.

Mr. MOON. I am not undertaking to question the gentleman's views. He has a right to express them. I am expressing the view the committee entertained.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am expressing the view that we adopted the rate as being exclusive of the compensation for carrying the mail to the station. That is what the Bourne Commission rates are; but the bill as reported leaves that discretionary with the Postmaster General, and that was not in our motion, as I understood it.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I think perhaps the difference between the gentleman and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is largely due to the difference between the Bourne report of what should be and the committee's idea of what should be. As I understand, the Post Office Committee accepts the Bourne rate simply. The Post Office Committee, on the other hand, uses the words "not exceeding," which places in the discretion of the Postmaster General the power to reduce that rate. That is not in the report of the Bourne Commission.

Mr. STEENERSON. That may be an explanation; but we agreed to the motion to adopt the Bourne rates, and the Bourne rates say expressly that they are exclusive of carrying the mail to the station. It seems to me that we have varied the rates in adopting the clause that says that the company shall carry the mail to the station except where the Postmaster General in his discretion relieves them of that duty. That was my understanding, anyway.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, having returned to the section of the bill to which I referred a moment ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet put the request of the gentleman. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to pages 38 and 39 of the bill.

Mr. MOON. And insert the amendments that I have read.

Mr. MANN. For the purpose of offering certain amendments.

Mr. MOON. Yes, for the purpose of offering the amendments which I have read.

The CHAIRMAN. To offer certain amendments.

Mr. MANN. Which he has read.

The CHAIRMAN. Which he has tendered but which have not yet been reported. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment pending to the paragraph that we have just been discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota has not yet been recognized for his pending amendment. The Chair will give the gentleman an opportunity of offering his amendment later. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, in order that the amendments may be pending for discussion, I offer them at this time, and send them to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38 strike out lines 24 to 26, inclusive, and insert: "In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as the combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this morning I called the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that he had made an error of $6,000,000 in his bill, when he stated that I was mistaken. The amendment now offered by the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Tennessee was incorrect and the gentleman from New York was correct about that.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad, indeed, to receive the courteous admission of the gentleman from Tennessee, which I rather expected, knowing his honorable and upright character. But inasmuch as we are coming to a series of amendments and as it was stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, his last amendment was not correct—I think the gentleman misstated it—I think the committee, before it votes on this amendment, ought to know the precise situation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please state wherein there is an error of $6,000,000?

Mr. BENNET. That is just what I am going to take 15 minutes to do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought that was admitted and the gentleman was about to pass to something else.

Mr. BENNET. No; it is admitted, but I am going to show what it was in order to have it right now. The gentleman's amendment on Saturday made an error of $6,170,172, and was arrived at in this fashion. There was the Bourne Commission, which made a report, which is Document 1155, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and amongst other things that report provided:

That there should be paid for full railway post office car service a terminal charge of eight dollars and a half for each round trip or four dollars and a quarter for each single trip of a 60-foot car, irrespective of the distance run.

The gentleman from Tennessee in that same Congress introduced a bill, H. R. 17042, in which he inserted a rate which differed from the Bourne Commission rate in two particulars. The Bourne Commission rate is a certain fixed rate of eight dollars and a half a car. The Moon rate on page 11, lines 21 and 22, is a permissive rate, because this House ought to bear in mind that all these rates to the railroads are counterfeit money—they are stage money. The Postmaster General is simply prohibited from giving them any more than that, but he can give them any amount less that he pleases.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from New York admit that all the rates now in effect are permissive rates?

Mr. BENNET. Permissive rates?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from New York frankly admits a somewhat extensive ignorance of the postal laws in that regard.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman take my word that they are permissive rates now?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, if these gentlemen will do that, and he will stop to consider that those rates have always been permissive and no Postmaster General, not even the present Postmaster General, in the history of the Post Office Department, has ever attempted to assume the responsibility of paying less than the maximum rate.

Mr. BENNET. I do not doubt that is so, but the gentleman will concede that what I said was correct, that the Postmaster General could pay any amount less that he pleased. Is not that right?

Mr. MADDEN. He could, but he never has.

Mr. BENNET. But he could.

Mr. MADDEN. He never has.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. PLATT. The present laws do not require the railroads to carry the mail; this bill does.

Mr. BENNET. And that provision is clearly unconstitutional, but that does not change this situation at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For this once and this is the last time, for I desire to make a connected and coherent statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman always does. Which provision is it the gentleman says is unconstitutional?

Mr. BENNET. The provision under which they can fine the railroads $5,000 a day for failure to carry the mails.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If Congress confers too much power to the discretion of the Postmaster General——

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). Of the Postmaster General by this proposition, does the gentleman think that that could be remedied by referring the whole matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BENNET. That is where it ought to go.

Mr. MADDEN. That is where it does go.

Mr. BENNET. After they have fixed the rate, then they say they can go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOON. Suppose they went to the Interstate Commerce Commission now, you would have the rates fixed by the statistician of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would you not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but they would be fixed and not discretionary rates, made subject——

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield for a while. I asked for 15 minutes in which to make a few remarks myself. Coming back now to the point where I started, to illustrate the difference between the two items—it is very important in connection with the third or fourth amendment the gentleman proposes to offer—his bill says:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

That is, if the car started, say, from New York to Buffalo, under the Moon bill it got $2 for the initial rate to start, $2 for its rate at Buffalo, $2 for starting back, and $2 for arriving in New York; $8, or 50 cents less than the Bourne Commission rate.

But under the Bourne Commission provision they got the $8.50. Under the Moon provision they got not to exceed $8. When the committee came to make up this bill, which is partly the Moon bill and partly the Bourne bill, an attempt was made to give the Bourne rate. That was the statement made, and I have no doubt that was the committee's intention. But they retained the Moon structure.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BENNET. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. The reason for that is this, that these rates are "not-to-exceed" rates. In the Bourne Commission report they were mandatory rates, and the language of this bill must be necessarily different from the language in the Bourne bill, because one is permissive, as you say, and the other is mandatory.

Mr. BENNET. And when they come to offer their amendment now they have to change the language of the Moon bill, because the Moon bill does not go into it at all, and the amendment which is reported from the Clerk's desk shows that. On page 38, lines 24, 25, and 26, the language of the bill originally was:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Now, when the committee amended it on Saturday they simply struck out the $2, retaining the old Moon structure, and stated to the House that they were putting in the Bourne Commission rate, and put in the $4.25 instead of $2, so that the car got $4.25 when it started, $4.25 when it got to Buffalo, $4.25 when it started back from Buffalo, and $4.25 when it got to New York. This committee, which has been rather criticizing us because we were asking questions when they got to that point, and told the House they were giving an increase of $1,800,000, actually gave the railroads an increase of $6,070,172, the figures under the existing law being $4,359,646; the figures under the amendment would have been $12,140,344, an increase of $6,070,172 over what they said they were giving.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not want the House to be misled, I am sure.

Mr. BENNET. Certainly not.

Mr. MADDEN. And I am sure that he will admit facts when he sees them.

Mr. BENNET. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. This committee stated to the House on several occasions that the difference between the Bourne rates and the Moon rates for terminal service was $1,802,000, and that was exactly what the committee expected to substitute for the rates which the bill carried when it was reported to the House. And the mere fact that when the chairman of the committee in offering his amendment inadvertently suggested something contrary to that, is no crime and it ought not to be criticized.

Mr. BENNET. It ought to be criticized, and the statement the gentleman just made ought to be criticized, because it is incorrect.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is not incorrect.

Mr. BENNET. The bill as reported to the House carried no increase at all.

Mr. MADDEN. I said that we intended to make it $1,800,000.

Mr. BENNET. Exactly. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was intended to make an increase of $1,800,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I said.

Mr. BENNET. And, as a matter of fact, he doubled the Bourne rates by his amendment and increased it $6,000,000 more than he said.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman seems to forget that the rate in the bill was unintentionally put in and was not the rate the committee intended to put in at all.

Mr. BENNET. Nobody denies that.

Mr. MOON. And therefore the amendment offered yesterday was intended only to cover the rate as agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. BENNET. The Bourne rate.

Mr. MOON. And the mistake made in it was simply in not making the rate apply to terminal charges. Of course, it was an unintentional mistake and one about which I do not think there need be any trouble at all. If the gentleman desires it, the chairman of the committee will take all responsibility as to that.

Mr. BENNET. There are two or three more amendments on that same line, and we should understand exactly what the distinction is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from New York think that he is discovering the woodchuck in this legislation that was referred to in the argument on the adoption of the rule making this in order?

Mr. BENNET. I would not say that anybody in this House had the letters "R. I." stamped on their foreheads or anywhere else. I make the assertion, and believe it, that this was an intentional error, and after the committee had this bill under consideration for about three weeks in this House, and had criticized a whole lot of us for asking questions and taking part in the debate, we find that when they came to offer an amendment they made an error of over $6,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And these woodchucks generally, intentionally or otherwise, creep into hastily considered legislation of this kind.

Mr. BENNET. And absolutely justifies the criticism of the gentleman from Kansas made on the adoption of the rule calling for legislation by rider, when a great committee of this House has to come back here and admit that they made an error of $6,000,000 in just one part of the bill. I do not know how many errors there are in the bill. There is one thing to which I will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, and he can take time, I am sure, to explain it. The gentleman from Illinois made an admirable speech on the 11th of February.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say he would yield me time?

Mr. BENNET. The committee will.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought you said I could take time after you were through.

Mr. BENNET. You are a Member of the House and entitled to five minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made an admirable speech on the 11th of February, and amongst other things, on page 2427, the second column, of the RECORD, he said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. During this five minutes I shall decline interruption except from the gentleman from Tennessee, who asked permission for an extension of my time.

The gentleman from Illinois said, on February 11:

> The aggregate pay under the plan that I have just described amounts to about $63,000,000 per annum, and it is at the rate of 9.17 cents per ton-mile without space payment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman say what plan I was describing?

Mr. BENNET. Yes. It was under the present plan.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Then the gentleman proceeds:

> Add the $5,000,000, or the $3,543.59 per car, to the tonnage payment and you have 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail hauled by the American railroads for the Government of the United States.

Now, I hold in my hand the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915. On page 4 of that report he says that the amount paid to the railroads under the first item mentioned by the gentleman was $57,105,333.75; that there was paid to it for Railway Post-Office Service $4,211,984.03, or a total of $61,000,000——

Mr. MADDEN. Sixty-two million dollars.

Mr. BENNET. Instead of the $63,000,000 stated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman just stated it was $57,000,000 for the first item.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield until I get the statistics through. The total for transportation was $57,105,333.75, the total for R. P. O. was $4,211,984.03, making a total of $61,317,317.78.

Now, in order to get at the cost you have got to add to that the two items, one known as the blue-tag item, which for that year was $625,000 in round numbers; but as the gentleman from Illinois was speaking in round numbers I will add to that $800,000 for the blue tag, making a total of $62,117,317.78. But the gentleman in his speech made a total not of $63,000,000 but of $68,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. It was $63,000,000 altogether.

Mr. BENNET. I will read it. The gentleman says:

> The aggregate pay under the plan that I have just described amounts to about $63,000,000 per annum, and it is at the rate of 9.17 cents per ton-mile without space payment. Add the $5,000,000, or the $3,543.59 per car, to the tonnage payment and you have—

And you have to do it in order to reach this result—

> And you have 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail hauled by the American railroads for the Government of the United States.

The difficulty is that when the gentleman came to make up his figures he added in the railway post-office item twice.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. BENNET. He must have done so, because he said the $63,000,000——

Mr. MADDEN. Exclusive of the space payment.

Mr. BENNET. Well, $63,000,000 without space payment, and then "add." Add to what?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about the rate per ton-mile now.

Mr. BENNET. Then "add." The rate per ton-mile was 9.17 cents, and the amount paid was $63,000,000. Then the gentleman says:

> Add the $5,000,000, or the $3,543.59 per car, to the tonnage payment and you have 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail hauled by the American railroads for the Government of the United States.

If you take the $63,000,000, and have a ton rate of 9.17 cents without space payment——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman wants to be accurate.

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. You have $63,000,000 as the aggregate. I said the aggregate payment was $63,000,000, and that the rate per ton-mile is 9.17 cents without the space-pay proposition, which amounts to practically $5,000,000; and that that, divided up and added, would make another cent, and make the ton-mile payment 10.17 cents.

Mr. BENNET. Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the committee concededly made a $6,000,000 mistake on Saturday, their statements ought to be looked into pretty carefully, and I say that without any discourtesy.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, of course.

Mr. BENNET. And I use, in answer to the gentleman's statement, his own language on the 11th of February, where he says—

> The aggregate pay under the plan that I have just described amounts to about $63,000,000 per annum, and it is at the rate of 9.17 cents per ton-mile without space payment. Add the $5,000,000, or the $3,543.59 per car, to the tonnage payment, and you have 10.17 cents per ton-mile for every ton of mail hauled by the American railroads for the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this committee, bearing in mind the fact that there are 41,000 miles of railroads in the hands of receivers to-day, more than at any other time in the history of the Government, ought to give this matter very careful consideration, and see to it that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes to answer this gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is endeavoring to misconstrue the meaning of the words which were used in my speech.

Perhaps I do not understand English as well as the gentleman from New York, but I am absolutely disinterested, and I am acting entirely as a Member of this House, without any interest whatever on either side of this case; and I say, without any fear of successful contradiction, that the gentleman from New York misconstrued the language that I used in my speech.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman says I misconstrued his language.

Mr. MADDEN. The language can not be so construed if it is fairly construed. I did not say that we added $5,000,000 to $63,000,000. What I said was that we paid $63,000,000 in the aggregate for railroad post-office cars. I said that without the space plan the ton-mile rate would be 9.17 cents, and that is true; and that if we added the $5,000,000 it would add one more cent to the ton-mile payment; not adding the $5,000,000 to the $63,000,000, but adding the 1 cent to the ton-mileage charge. The gentleman knows that just as well as anybody does, and there is no reason why he should try to misconstrue what was said in my speech, and he can not make anybody misunderstand it anyway, no matter how he tries. I think it is as plain as it can be, that it means what it says and that it says what it means, and that it means that the railway companies are getting 10.17 cents per ton-mile under the present plan of payment. Further than that, what was said later on means that they will get 12.17 cents per ton-mile under the proposed plan of payment. There was no intention to deceive anybody in the statement of the case. It was a plain, unvarnished statement of facts.

I have no objection to any opposition that anybody may make to any section of this bill. The thing I would like to see somebody do who stands here in opposition to the bill is to present a state of facts in opposition to the facts that have already been presented. Nobody has done that. The opposition has been factious. It has been for the purpose of delaying the consideration of the bill. It has not given any information to the House. No argument has been made against the bill, in opposition to the argument made for the bill. If anyone has any figures to controvert the figures that have already been given, or any arguments to controvert the arguments already made, why do they not produce the arguments and the figures? They have not done it. They can not do it. They have not got them. If any railroad company in the United States has the figures, and anybody on this floor is willing to present those figures, why do they not give the figures to somebody on the floor who will present them? I have talked with many railroad men about this bill, and I have not found one who could give me any figures showing what the rates should be. I have had one letter in criticism of the speech I made. That letter came from one of the biggest railroad companies in the United States, and the only criticism they made of my statement was that I stated that passengers were carried by space, and they wanted to know how I reached that conclusion. Passengers are carried by space. Everybody knows that.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Excuse me for a moment. It costs just as much to carry a passenger who weighs 50 pounds as it does to carry a passenger who weighs 500 pounds. Is that space, or is it weight? Let the railroad companies answer the question themselves. I have tried to prove my disinterestedness in this matter. I have only one anxiety about it, and that is to reach a right conclusion; and if any of these gentlemen who are criticizing this bill will give me facts that will disprove anything that I have said, then I may be able to change my mind; but as long as they fail to state facts they can not convince me. Now I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have an extension of one minute to answer the question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague have one minute in which to answer the question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from New York stated that the blue-tag shipments are added to the railway post-office pay. Now, is it not a fact that he is mistaken about that and that the amount paid for blue-tag freight is taken out of the appropriation for railway mail pay?

Mr. MADDEN. Why, certainly, so that it should not be added in figuring the total.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is an item of transporting postal cards and empty mail bags that should be added.

Mr. MADDEN. It amounts to $63,000,000 in the aggregate, and the gentleman from New York in compiling his figures, wherever he obtained them, has reached a wrong conclusion, and the figures are approximately $63,000,000, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Resuming the subject that I could not complete a few moments ago, notwithstanding the very extended courtesy of the House, I want to ask, with the purpose of answering my own question, of course, why it is that on the Post Office appropriation bill Congress should undertake to legislate with reference to the parcel post? I think every Member of this House, even the author of the amendment, will admit that, like all other transportation subjects, it is a complex one, and that time and patience are necessary in order to secure information for good opinion. That was done with relation to the railway mail bill itself. A commission was appointed. One of the commissioners gave exhaustive consideration to the subject. But here was the parcel post, a subject equally complex, because it is a transportation subject, and the House, without notice, without any committee investigation, is asked to throw this rock into the system and destroy or cripple the development of a structure that is now operating with great profit to the Post Office Department, and with great profit to the people. I make the suggestion that however honest this amendment may have been in its inception, this was not the time and place to go legislating on the parcel post, even if the House thought it could handle these topics better than the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Postmaster General. The gentleman who offered the amendment was himself a member of the Post Office Committee. That amendment could have been offered in the Post Office Committee, when there would have been a chance for gentlemen Members of the House interested in this subject to have gone over the thing, to have investigated it, and you would have had the benefit of a report of the Post Office Committee on the subject. But as it is you have nothing. Unfortunately, I was absent on Saturday, not expecting, of course, that a generic subject like this would have been thrown in, as a mere incident, with another great subject.

The only argument made in its favor was that in the operation of the parcel post at some points some roads complained that it was diverting freight from the roads to the parcel post. Gentlemen of the House, the answer to that is that the express rates in these higher weights are cheaper than the parcel-post rates. The express companies are diverting traffic and doing any damage that may be done in the direction of diverting the freight of the railroad.

Now, would you repeal the parcel post in order to effect some incidental, problematical, doubtful, speculative benefit to some railroads on account of freight diversion? Would this House like to take the responsibility of doing a thing like that, withdrawing from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power that it exercises with so much wisdom and satisfaction in the transportation field generally?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. In a hearing before the Post Office Committee the railroads had a letter read from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Postmaster General, in which they stated that the commission had no jurisdiction in the matter of the reasonableness of rates, that the parcel-post act conferred no jurisdiction upon the commission to do that.

Mr. LEWIS. That is an erroneous interpretation of the situation, because the statute makes all changes in parcel-post rates subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought so, too; but the commission took the position that they had no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. LEWIS. I know the commission wrote a letter some years ago, not of that character, but I can not go into that at this point. Let us examine and see what merit there is in the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Some roads come down and complain that under the operation of this bill or of the existing law freight will be diverted and carried as parcel-post matter. Let me call your attention again to the transportation facts in this matter. The railroads get on an average only $1.90 for moving a ton of freight 250 miles. The postal rates on a ton of parcel post that distance would be something over $20. A cent a pound is the lowest rate by rail for parcel post, and that means $20 a ton. I doubt whether there is any railroad that finds it necessary to charge more than ten times as much for moving a ton of freight as the average freight charge, but if there is a special condition it ought to be dealt with by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and this child of popular favor, this servant that has come to the farmers and people of the country, lifting the parcel traffic from three hundred millions a year in 1912 to seven hundred millions a year in 1915, ought not to be stabbed to the heart by superficial and inconsequential treatment on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota to the fact that in order to get the amount of pay to the railroads in any one year you do have to have to add the blue-tag item. On page 15 of the Postmaster General's report he will find the figures given of $57,105,333.75. Then, turning to page 11, he will find the railway post-office item, $4,211,984.03. Going back to page 4 he will find this statement, referring to the $57,000,000 item: "These amounts"—they use the plural because they give three different items—"do not include the estimated expenditure for transportation of periodical mail."

The transportation of periodical mail is the blue-tag item. So that in order to get the amounts that the railroads get you have to add $57,000,000 plus $4,000,000 plus $625,000 which the department says was paid for blue-tag mail. So the gentleman from Minnesota was in error.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. My statement was that the blue-tag item is paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of mail by railroad.

Mr. BENNET. Of course, and in order to get the amount paid, the amount the railroads receive, you have to add that item.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think it is good bookkeeping. It is one appropriation.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman knows that there is an absolute difference between an appropriation and a payment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman from New York aware that this bill carries an item for the freight on post cards and mail bags, $510,000?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is not paid out of the railway transportation item, but it is carried in a separate item; but the blue-tag item is paid out of the transportation of mail by railroad.

Mr. BENNET. And therefore in order to get the amount that is being paid out you have to add the fifty-seven million and the four million, the item for the railway post-office cars and the blue-tag item, because the department says that these amounts do not include the expenditure for transportation of periodical mail.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is a question whether they reported it under the single appropriation, but it seems to be the proper way to report it under that appropriation.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that they did not report it that way.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman from New York is correct, he omitted the $510,000 for transportation on mail bags, post cards, and so forth. That should be added.

Mr. BENNET. According to the report of the Postmaster General that is included in the $57,000,000. I am not responsible for the way the report was made up, but when I make a statement of how a result is reached, I seek to be correct.

Mr. STEENERSON. If that item is included in the $57,000,000 for transportation by railroad routes, why should not the other item, taken out of the appropriation for railway post-office pay, be also included in that item? The report itself shows that the way I suggested is the right way.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but they do not do it, as the report shows, and the gentleman ought to address his criticism to the Post Office Department and not accuse another gentleman who makes a correct statement of making an incorrect statement.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have received a letter from the Springfield (Mass.) Board of Trade relative to the pending bill, referring to some resolutions which had been adopted by the Board of Trade. I do not care to take the time of the committee to read it, as I have shown it to the chairman of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say in reference to the matter to which the gentleman has referred that I have seen the letter and that I intended no reflection upon any member of that Board of Trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., February 24, 1916.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GILLETT: The insinuations of Chairman MOON of the Post Office Committee, in a recent speech, that the action taken by commercial organization in favor of increased railway mail pay was passed through railroad influence is absolutely untrue and misleading as far as the Springfield Board of Trade is concerned.

A resolution was passed on January 10, 1916, by the committee on national legislation of the Springfield Board of Trade, subscribing to the view that the railroads should be justly compensated by the Government for services performed.

On February 1, 1916, the resolution recommended by the committee on national legislation was adopted by the board of directors of the Springfield Board of Trade.

For your convenience I am inclosing copy of the resolution passed by this organization.

Yours, very truly, GEORGE E. FOSS,
Secretary Springfield Board of Trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all pro forma amendments will be withdrawn, and the question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to the paragraph on page 38 of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 24 to 26, inclusive, on page 38, and insert:

"In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee now offers the amendment on page 39, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 5 to 9, inclusive, on page 39, and insert:

"In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2.75 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and $2 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does the gentleman from Tennessee follow the exact language of the original Moon bill in this amendment?

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reading and attempting to compare it with the bill we now have in hand, I find that the word "combined" is inserted.

Mr. MOON. That word is put there to fix definitely the fact that it was the two trips to be paid for. That is the language suggested by the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the language now being used in the amendment the language in the bill that we had before us the other day, before the amendments were made to it?

Mr. MOON. No; the word "combined" was not used. It is now used in order to make definite the proposition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman proposing to speak upon this amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I am going to speak upon a topic that I have not yet finished.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman defer that until we can get through with these amendments and then move to strike out the last word?

Mr. LEWIS. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, as I read the Bourne Commission report for a 15-foot railway post-office apartment car, the round-trip charge was $4. That is correct, is it? That is on page 23 of the Bourne Commission report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is $2 in the amendment, is it not?

Mr. BENNET. I am inclined to think that as now reported the amendment is in accordance with the Bourne report, $2 for each single trip, for a 15-foot apartment car.

Mr. MOON. That is correct. I have the same language before me.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I have not had a chance to look at the amendment. Has the gentleman any objection to having this amendment adopted now, and if it turns out not to be the Bourne rate, to return to it and correct it and make it the Bourne rate?

Mr. MOON. I do not know what could be the Bourne rate unless it is what we have before us. I have what the committee understood is the Bourne rate.

Mr. BENNET. I was reading the Bourne rate from page 23 of the report.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is $2.

Mr. MOON. It is stated differently from the Bourne report. That is all. It is stated differently, but it means exactly the same.

Mr. BENNET. I am inclined to think that is so.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has a further amendment to page 39, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 12 to 14, inclusive, on page 39, and insert:
"In addition thereto, he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk, and will ask that the Clerk report it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 6, after the word "specified," insert the following:
"Provided, That any railroad company having a mileage not exceeding 250 miles shall have the right to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission from any order, decision, or judgment of the Postmaster General given under the provisions of this paragraph, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, on appeal, shall determine and fix the rates to be paid the company making the appeal."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide a reasonable rate, a fair rate of compensation to the short-line railroad companies. It is admitted that the general law now existing, and it is contended that the law proposed by this bill does not meet fairly the rates that should be paid to short-line companies.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman does not quite understand there. We do not admit it does not meet the requirements in most cases, because it does; but there are some isolated cases, but I think those are few.

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman I understand it is not altogether admitted by the Post Office Committee of the House that the rates provided in this bill do not generally meet the fair and reasonable needs of the short-line companies, but it is contended otherwise by some of the short-line companies.

Mr. MOON. We think it does, with the exception of isolated cases, which this section protects.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment simply effects this: That if the short-line companies are dissatisfied with the view that the Postmaster General takes of the matter, they may go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I think it is only fair and reasonable. I believe these short-line companies are doing a splendid work in the different communities of the country and should be encouraged. They are building and have built into new communities and are carrying freight, passenger traffic, and mails where the larger companies have refused to accommodate the public. In many cases the patrons of these lines have directly out of their own pockets contributed to the building of these railroads. I believe these short-line companies should be encouraged and that they should be dealt with fairly by the Government and should be paid a just and fair compensation at all times for carrying the United States mails. This amendment is to that end and provides for the right of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, a right which I am firmly of the opinion these short-line railroads should have given them in this bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state this will be a discrimination in the treatment of railroads to give to the short-line railroads a special right to appeal in individual cases if the same right was denied to the trunk lines, to the transcontinental railroads, and so on.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FINLEY. I will.

Mr. NORTON. This bill does give to the railroads generally the right to appeal if 51 per cent of the railroad mileage petitions for appeal, but, as the gentleman must know, the short-line companies do not compose 51 per cent of the railroad mileage of the country.

Mr. FINLEY. That includes all the railroads—short line, long line, trunk lines, continental lines, and all railroads. I will say to the gentleman that I believe there are 700 short-line railroads in the United States, and there possibly—oh, I do not know how many railroads in the United States; maybe two or three thousand of them.

Mr. NORTON. But these 700 short-line companies do not compose 51 per cent of the mileage of the railroads of the country.

Mr. FINLEY. That is true.

Mr. NORTON. Thus they have no right to appeal under the bill if they are all dissatisfied with the judgment of the Postmaster General in dealing with them.

Mr. FINLEY. Under that general provision of 51 per cent that includes short lines as well as trunk lines, and so forth. I will say this, that that would be a discrimination such as I would not want to see go into this bill, nor do I believe anyone else who will study the subject carefully.

We must legislate here for the whole country, and we make special provision here for all the railroads where, on account of special conditions, on account of such conditions a fair compensation can not be paid under the law as fixed here in this bill, they may make a special contract. And I will say this to the gentleman, that to pass his amendment is impracticable from another standpoint. Does the gentleman know the condition of business before the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day? I had occasion some time ago to inquire, and I believe they are 1,800 cases behind, and the question is, What is to be done about it in order to expedite the business before that commission?

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Would the gentleman argue that because the Interstate Commerce Commission now is not so organized that it can take care of the business that should be taken care of by the commission a proper privilege should be withheld from these short-line railroad companies and a palpable injustice done them?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not think any injustice is being done them. That is my opinion and that is my view.

Mr. NORTON. But if there was any injustice done them they could not, under this bill as it is proposed by your committee, appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FINLEY. It would be a discrimination to give each of them the right to appeal if we deny to the other railroads that right to which they are entitled if the short-line railroads have it, and so I think the gentleman's amendment is an impractical one. I think it is wrong in principle and I think it is impracticable from the standpoint of being carried into effect, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that there is a fundamental difference between a main line, a trunk line, and a short line, and that there should be a provision made for these short-line companies?

Mr. FINLEY. The short lines are about 15 per cent, or something like that.

Mr. NORTON. They have no right to appeal under the 51 per cent provision of this bill. I trust the gentleman recognizes this very plain fact.

Mr. FINLEY. Any railroad, including the short lines, can go to the Postmaster General and make a special contract where conditions warrant and receive higher pay than provided is in this bill, so I submit the gentleman's amendment ought not to be adopted from any standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all pro forma amendments to this section will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking-water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material, and not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railway company not conforming to these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. Until July 1, 1917, in cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question about this paragraph, where it reads, top of page 43, in reference to the construction of steel cars.

And not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railway company not conforming to these provisions of August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913.

It looks to me a little belated to insert that provision in this bill which becomes a law in 1916. It probably was appropriate when the bill was first introduced, but to legislate now in reference to the years 1913, 1914, and 1915 looks as though it were carelessness on our part to insert that, as you have already in the bill a provision that after July 1, 1917, all of these cars shall be constructed of steel, or steel underframing or equally indestructible material; also a provision that no cars shall be contracted for that are not constructed of steel. So I do not see what good it is now to insert in the bill a provision which will add 25 per cent in 1913, 1914, and 1915. I think that ought to be stricken out of the bill because I do not think it has any effect and it looks badly.

Mr. MOON. I do not think it will make any material difference if stricken out. The gentleman can make a motion if he so desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out on page 43, after the word "material," in line 2, down to and including the word "thirteen" in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 2, after the word "material," strike out the following language:

"And not less than 25 per cent of the full railway post-office cars of a railway company not conforming with these provisions on August 24, 1912, shall be replaced with cars constructed of steel annually after June, 1913."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to change the punctuation in that amendment?

Mr. MANN. No; I think not. There is a semicolon in there, and it will stay in there, I take it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If the committee will bear with this desultory method of discussion I think we will be able to get to a correct conclusion on a subject like this.

First, I want to call to the attention of Members on my side of the House their own platform and the utterance of their own great leader—really a very great leader—I refer to the President himself, who, in my judgment, is the greatest premier of his age. In the Democratic platform adopted in Baltimore "a parcel-post or postal-express system" was promised. I am using the very word. And the President himself in his letter of acceptance said:

We must add to our present post office a parcel post as complete as that of any other nation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I will.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, I believe, stated a number of foreign nations that had the parcel post at a limit of over 100 pounds.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK. Some of those nations own their own transportation lines. Which ones of them do? I do not recall, and I would like to know.

Mr. LEWIS. Answering too quickly a question like that, I say most of them; but that does not affect the problem.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that all of those nations own their own transportation lines?

Mr. LEWIS. No; not all of their lines. For example, Russia has a parcel post weight limit, as I recall, of 120 pounds. She owns about two-thirds of the lines, and one-third of them are private. The fact of private ownership or Government ownership does not affect the problem; and if it did no tribunal in the world is as able to solve the question as the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, it has taken 40 years to get the American people into a legislative position in which they are able to work out a parcel-post system. It is not unfair; it is not inaccurate to say that, so far as we have gone, with unimportant exceptions, the parcel post in this country ranks almost first among the nations. We are moving now about four parcels per capita by parcel post.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I will.

Mr. AYRES. And will you state what is a fair limit in this country?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say, not momentarily but ultimately, 100 pounds. The railroad stops carrying freight at 100 pounds. It has a minimum weight limit of 100 pounds. The rate is the same whether you send 10 pounds by freight or 100 pounds by freight, and the Post Office should take it up where the railways stop——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman answer me a question, please?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Where the railroads are privately owned in England, what is the rate?

Mr. LEWIS. They collect the class traffic from the consignor and deliver the class traffic to the consignee, and the railroads of England graduate their weight limits down to 2 pounds, not 100 pounds as here, and have a rate as low as 8 cents. They never needed a parcel post in England as we do here. The country is unique in that respect, for the class freight in England is all receiving the same services rendered by the express company of our country.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the weight?

Mr. LEWIS. The postal weight is 11 pounds. As a matter of fact, it is 3 pounds. The rates are so high in England that nothing more than 3 pounds travels, and the average parcel in England weighs 2½ pounds. The real parcel traffic is done by the railways.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the average weight of the parcel carried in this country?

Mr. LEWIS. The average weight of the parcel carried in this country is a fraction less than 4 pounds, counting the parcels from a pound and up.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought it was less than 2 pounds. I thought it was a pound and 11 ounces, according to the reports.

Mr. LEWIS. In reaching that datum they count all of the fourth-class pieces, but if you treat the parcel post as beginning at a pound and up, then the average parcel is about 4 pounds.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any justification for segregating anything that is parcel post?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; because the larger parcel requires a special kind of attention and above 4 ounces takes a zone system, but in order to find out what the new traffic is—that is, traffic originating with the parcel post—gentlemen can find that by counting the parcels from 1 pound and up.

Now, I have no purpose here this afternoon to depreciate the importance of this railway pay bill. What I shall say on that subject I trust will not be misunderstood.

A commission gave much of its time and very assiduous labor to determining the results that are now before you. But I do say this to the House—and I say it advisedly; I say it with a knowledge of the difference between the present methods of railway mail pay and those proposed in this bill—that if the parcel post of this country has got to suffer an iota in getting this new railway pay bill over, then the price paid is too great, too great indeed.

I have no suggestion to offer that anybody is actuated by motives other than those that are of public service in their character, and I do not make this suggestion with any such idea in my mind; but I do say to this House this afternoon, that if this bill passes——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Make it five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Maryland be given five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. LEWIS. If this bill finally passes, with this heart stab in for the parcel post, with the parcel post hog-tied in its competition with the express companies of the country, the stocks of the express companies will go up $25,000,000 in a week. All they will need is to have their competitor hog-tied, hog-tied especially on the rails. If they were discharging their function, if they were really meeting the requirements of transportation, I should not have a word to say. But our experience here in three years is that of the seven parcels moving now they could move only three. Their rates were so high, their limitations of service were so great that four out of seven of the people's parcels were killed at the very point of their origin. The proof of that is that 700,000,000 parcels are moving now, counting the service of the express companies and the Post Office combined, as against only 300,000,000 moving by the express companies in 1912.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very curious to know if the gentleman knows what the total percentage of the parcel post carried weighs 50 pounds.

Mr. LEWIS. I can not tell you that without investigation; but the gentleman can find it by looking at the reports. The reports, I want to say, are creditable not only to the Post Office Department, but to the subject matter itself. There is hardly any question that you might wish to ask about the parcel post in its operation that these reports do not answer in general and in detail.

Now, let us come to the question, Which are the people most interested in at this moment, this readjustment of railway mail pay or the blow at the parcel post that kills its hope for the future and "hog ties" it in its struggle with the express companies of the country? I want to say—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this statement, made after close study—that this railway pay bill will not give the Post Office a cheaper service over the railroads unless they can get at least 4 tons of mail in each car. They are moving now 2½ tons of mail in each car. That in 1913 cost about 10 cents a ton-mile. This bill in effect will give the railroads in effect about 26 cents a car-mile.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it gives 24.296 cents.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, it has been raised since two years ago.

Mr. MADDEN. That is on the basis of the figures given.

Mr. LEWIS. Then say 25 cents per car-mile for general reasoning. That means that if they only continue to carry 2½ tons in a mail car, as they do now, the Post Office will be paying 10 cents a ton-mile for the service. But I call now the gentleman's attention to a fact of recent development: It is not costing the Post Office Department of this country for traffic added in postal work during the last three years more than 6 cents a ton-mile for such new traffic. If you take all the parcel-post weight increases, take all the mail increases since April, 1913, and divide those increases into the increases of compensation paid to the roads under the existing railway pay law, you will find that it amounts to about 6 cents a ton-mile; and if we have got to trade the right of the parcel post to live and develop, to serve the farm, to serve the merchant, but more than all that, in a financial sense, to yield the greatest profit to the postal establishment that any of its service does, except the first-class mail, then I say that this whole railway pay law is trifling in comparison of value, and the people of the United States will feel that way about it, too. They know what the parcel post means to them. They know what the developing of it through the Interstate Commerce Commission has meant for them, and they are not going to be pleased with an exchange of this great promising facility for transportation for a dubious railway pay proposition of this kind.

But that argument actually is not necessary. This amendment is no more necessary to this bill than an amendment to the bankruptcy laws. It has no more business in this bill than an amendment to the bankruptcy laws. I can not comprehend why it should have been lugged in here on this bill. The bill has been before this House before. Members of former Congresses knew about its provisions. With some slight changes, relating wholly to railway pay, it was reported in that form here in the past few weeks. The gentleman who offered this amendment, and who probably is still contending for it, is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and could have offered this amendment there, so that people who gave attention to this subject would then have had an opportunity for a hearing. Instead it was offered here in the House on Saturday afternoon, when many gentlemen, including myself, could not be present, and put over with a sparse five-minute discussion; put over on what theory? Put over on the theory that even with rates at $20 a ton the parcel post is going to divert some freight from certain kinds of railroads. I say to the gentlemen of the House that it is not too late to retrace our steps on this subject and leave this amendment out of the bill when it is finally passed. I believe it is admissible to demand a separate vote on any amendment when the bill comes to the final passage, and I ask gentlemen of the House, whatever their opinions, to give the benefit of the doubt to this young rival in the express company field, to give it a fair show for development. It has not proved any disappointment in the past. Give the Post Office at least one opportunity to make some money out of its postal activities. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland is a very sincere man, and I know that he is very much in earnest about the subject which he has just discussed. He has given the question a great deal of consideration, and I believe he thoroughly believes that his figures are correct. But he asserted a moment ago that the parcel-post rate gives to the railroad companies $20 per ton-mile, as I understood him.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not say that.

Mr. MADDEN. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. LEWIS. I said the parcel-post minimum rates are $20 a ton, that the railroads get only $1.90 on an average, and that freight which is diverted in that way is freight that ought to be diverted.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty dollars a ton-mile?

Mr. LEWIS. No; $20 a ton.

Mr. MADDEN. For how far?

Mr. LEWIS. For the second zone.

Mr. MADDEN. How many miles is that?

Mr. LEWIS. One hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. MADDEN. How much would that be a ton-mile?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not make my computations as quickly as that.

Mr. MADDEN. Less than 7 cents a ton-mile. Now, the railroads on the other side of this case argue that if we load the storage cars to their full capacity the rates which they receive will be only a cent and a quarter a ton-mile paid by the Post Office Department. There is a good deal of difference between the figures claimed by the gentleman from Maryland and the figures claimed by the railroad people. I have never believed that this legislation was intended to reduce the compensation of the railroad companies, but, rather, that it was intended to facilitate the handling of the mail by the department and to put the movement of the mails under scientific management.

I think the consensus of opinion throughout the country to-day is that the railroad companies are not being paid too much for moving the mails. I believe, on the other hand, that a great many people believe they are not being paid enough, and it is my understanding that this bill does increase the compensation to the railroad companies and not decrease it. And it is because of my belief that it does increase the rates and does justice that I am enthusiastically for it, in addition to the fact that I am for the scientific method of handling the question. If by any chance we should legislate to take away the income of the railroad companies for the performance of this service for the Post Office Department, we would not be doing our duty.

Everybody knows that I am not here speaking for any railroad company. The gentleman from Maryland is in favor of making the parcel-post package 100 pounds. The average weight of the package now is 1 pound and 11 ounces.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman from Maryland is in favor of the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission raising it to 100 pounds if on consideration it seems to them a wise thing to do.

Mr. MADDEN. The average weight now is 1 pound 11 ounces. Nobody knows how many packages are shipped which weigh even as high as 50 pounds apiece, but every person who has made a study of the question does know that whole carloads of 48-pound packages of brick, ore, sand and stone, and other heavy freight have been carried in the name of the parcel post, and I contend that that is not proper matter for carriage by mail in any such quantities. I believe that when we were organizing the parcel-post system of America we were intending to accommodate the people living in the rural districts by enabling them to exchange their products with the people living in the cities and the products of the people living in the cities with the people of the country at a reasonable transportation cost; and in the face of the fact that the average weight of the parcel to-day is only 1 pound and 11 ounces, I maintain that the limitation of 50 pounds in this bill is not unreasonable.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. If the gentleman thinks he is right in his statement that the average is only two pounds, is there any necessity of putting a limit in here? What is the necessity?

Mr. MADDEN. I think there is a necessity for it. I think that if the weight be increased to 100 pounds it will be necessary to have machinery to handle the packages. To-day a man can handle a 50-pound package, but who can handle a package of 100 pounds? The Post Office Department would have to employ derricks everywhere.

Mr. LEWIS. For 100 pounds?

Mr. MADDEN. For 100 pounds. The gentleman from Maryland would not undertake to handle a 100-pound package for delivery.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, yes; and I believe the gentleman from Illinois did it at one time in his life.

Mr. MADDEN. I did, but I would not want to start to do it over again.

Mr. LEWIS. No; and I would not want to see the gentleman start to do it either. [Laughter.] But I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the express companies have no weight limit. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment further?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; surely.

Mr. LEWIS. And the average weight of the express company parcel without any weight limit is only 40 pounds at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. If that be true, then there can be no harm in fixing a limit of 50 pounds on the parcel post, because if the average weight of the express parcel is only 40 pounds, the limit of 50 pounds for parcel post carried by the Post Office Department will not prevent the development of that service; and I contend that if the future proves the necessity for a greater weight and the country demands it, the Post Office Department will find a ready response on the part of the Congress of the United States whenever it can be shown that the country will be better served by having a limit of 100 pounds instead of 50 pounds; and I will say frankly to my friend from Maryland that I am as earnestly in favor of developing the parcel post as anybody in America, and that if I should happen by any chance to be a Member of the House when it is deemed necessary to increase the weight, I will be delighted to cast my vote and give my voice in favor of that proposition; but for the time being I believe that the best interests of the department will be served by a continuance of the limitation which is now in the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the position taken by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] is hardly logical. He seems to think that the life of the parcel post depends upon the weight of the package. That is not true. We have started out with a new Government agency, the parcel post. It is something that is being tried out in this country. This is a great country in area. The gentleman from Maryland mentioned Germany, with its 214,000 square miles, while this country has an area of 3,000,000 square miles. He also mentions France, with its 207,000 square miles, Belgium, and so on.

Mr. LEWIS. How about Russia?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; Russia, which has Government-owned railroads, largely. The gentleman seems to think that the weight of the package is the criterion, and that if you fix or limit it at all you necessarily stab the parcel post to the heart. I do not agree with the gentleman. I remember when the gentleman from Maryland came here and started out on a parcel-post propaganda. His proposition was that the Government should buy out the express companies, buy their equipment, good will, and so on. I believe he proposed to give them thirty or thirty-five million dollars—something utterly ridiculous. What use has the Government for the equipment of express companies? It would be worth nothing at all to it. Let me say to the gentleman from Maryland that he is not the father of the parcel-post idea in this country. The grangers of this country, long before the gentleman was born, passed resolutions at their national council or convention indorsing the parcel post and demanding it for the American people. From that day to this it has gone on. So far as I know, the gentleman from Maryland had about as much to do with the formation of the bill which passed Congress as any other Member of the House. It was largely framed by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and Senator Bourne, chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee. Of course the members of the conference committee went over the bill and it was framed in that way. Further, I submit that the gentleman is illogical in this, that he does not strike at the root of the evil.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman from South Carolina is only personal; he has not yet said a word in relation to the subject.

Mr. FINLEY. I am going to come to that. The gentleman has not touched the meat in the coconut. To-day in the first and second zones the weight limit is 50 pounds, and as to all other zones it is 20 pounds. Now, the parcel post is in its infancy, and the thing to do is to provide transportation facilities. That is what we are trying to do here. The real gist of the whole business is the rates fixed in the Bourne and Moon proposition that was adopted in Congress three or four years ago. The rates fixed there is what throttle the parcel post. Now, when we provide transportation facilities for carrying the parcels through the mail, then it will be time to rearrange these rates. That will be done and that will be the time to rearrange the rates fixed by the Post Office Department and the Interstate Commerce Commission; they fix 50 pounds for the first two zones and 20 pounds for all others. The gentleman from Maryland wants the bridle taken off entirely, and let it go without limit, only to be fixed by the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the weight was fixed at 1,000 pounds I think it would suit the gentleman from Maryland. The gentleman comes here and complains that he could not be here on Saturday. I had a conversation with the gentleman from Maryland Thursday evening, when he told me he had an appointment and could not be here. I told him that very important propositions were coming up, that we had been on the bill for nearly three weeks, and we wished to conclude it and get through sometime. He said that he had an appointment.

Mr. LEWIS. Did the gentleman from South Carolina know at that time that this amendment was coming up?

Mr. FINLEY. That is not in the discussion at all. It is the gentleman's own fault that he was not here. He had more important business somewhere else, and now he comes back and takes up the time of the House in argument because the weight limit has been fixed at 50 pounds, the same that the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed for the first and second zones. He complains because we have limited the weight to 50 pounds and he was not here. It is the gentleman's own fault, and I think we have had enough of this discussion.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, contention has been made that under existing law the Interstate Commerce Commission can determine the reasonableness of rates paid to the railroads for the carrying of parcels. I suggested to one of the gentlemen who spoke that that was not the case.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I made no such contention.

Mr. STEENERSON. I suggested that there was a letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the application of the Postmaster General for leave to raise the rate limit to 50 pounds that covered the point. I have the letter before me, and I will insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks; but I want to call special attention to the language:

We can conceive of no opposition to the increased weights and reduced rates proposed except from the carriers that transport the mails. We have had some objections from them on the ground that the increased weight should not be permitted until provision for additional compensation to the carriers has been made. This commission has no jurisdiction of and no duty to perform in connection with the contracts between the Post Office Department and the transportation companies for carrying the mails.

The commission have no power under existing law over the matter. This does not agree with the contention advanced a moment ago.

DECEMBER 5, 1913.

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General, Washington.

DEAR SIR: In your letter of November 24, 1913, you request the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission to certain stated changes in the regulations governing the Parcel Post System affecting increases in the weight limits and reductions in the rates to certain zones.

The commission has carefully considered the detailed information furnished by you as to actual experiences at 50 of the most important post offices in handling the parcel-post mails. It seems obvious that the service to the public will be promoted by these changes, provided the revenue from the service is not less than the cost thereof. Your experiences and statistics seem to show clearly that the revenue will not be less than the cost of the service.

We can conceive of no opposition to the increased weights and reduced rates proposed except from the carriers that transport the mails. We have had some objections from them on the ground that the increased weight should not be permitted until provision for additional compensation to the carriers has been made. This commission has no jurisdiction of and not duty to perform in connection with the contracts between the Post Office Department and the transportation companies for carrying the mails. The commission therefore directs me to say that it consents to the following changes, for which you have requested its consent:

(a) To reduce the rates for the third zone from 7 cents for the first pound and 5 cents for each additional pound to 6 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound;

(b) To reduce the rates for the fourth zone from 8 cents for the first pound and 6 cents for each additional pound to 7 cents for the first pound and 4 cents for each additional pound;

(c) To reduce the rates for the fifth zone from 9 cents for the first pound and 7 cents for each additional pound to 8 cents for the first pound and 6 cents for each additional pound;

(d) To reduce the rates for the sixth zone from 10 cents for the first pound and 9 cents for each additional pound to 9 cents for the first pound and 8 cents for each additional pound;

(e) To increase the weight limit for the first and second zones from 20 pounds to 50 pounds; and

(f) To increase the weight limit for the remaining zones from 11 pounds to 20 pounds.

Yours, very truly, E. E. CLARK, Chairman.

Therefore I say that it devolves upon the Congress to determine compensation, and we can not shift that over to the Interstate Commerce Commission unless we change the law. The law, as they hold it and as they construe it, does not give them jurisdiction to say how much would be a reasonable rate for the Government to pay the railroads for transporting the mails.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Railroad companies carrying mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation when required by the Postmaster General.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of much that has been said in respect to the treatment of railroads, and particularly since the gentleman from Maryland has suggested an extension of the Parcel Post Service, I desire to have read as a part of my remarks an article or a letter from Ralph Peters, president of the Long Island Railroad, and chairman of the general committee on railway-mail pay.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the EDITOR OF THE PUBLIC LEDGER.

SIR: The railroads of the country are united in protest against the Moon railway-mail-pay bill because as a piece of legislation it would be a distinct step backward. It is a destructive, not a constructive, measure. Its enactment would be a blow to the system of public regulation of common carriers. It would repudiate important principles of rate making that are recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by all other authorities.

Furthermore, it threatens to result in a mixing and confusion of the passenger and freight services that would be very likely to impair the speed and efficiency of the former, necessarily to the detriment of the traveling public. The separation of these two services, as everyone knows, marked the dividing line between primitive and modern railroading. If we have to run our passenger trains again with cars of freight attached, and hold them at every station while goods are being put on and off, the quality of the service is going to suffer. This will be none the less certain, even though the freight is carried in steel postal cars and is called "parcel post."

The Post Office Department has gone into the freight and express business. That, in plain language, is the significance of the heavy-weight parcel post and the transportation as "mail" of "farm and factory products" and general merchandise. The parcel-post weight limit has already been advanced to 50 pounds per package, and the department has repeatedly announced that it plans a further extension and development of the service. An advance in the weight limit to 100 pounds per package has been taken under consideration.

In this situation the department now demands of Congress the passage of a measure—the Moon bill—that will enable it to obtain transportation for the parcel post in bulk shipments for less than 1¼ cents per ton per mile. The railroads would be compelled to render this service in passenger trains—any trains that the department might designate, even the fastest and most costly to operate. The utter injustice of such a return must be evident from the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission allows from 2 to 7 cents per ton per mile for carrying freight similar to the parcel post in freight trains.

SHIPPER TO SET RATES.

Moreover the Moon bill is drawn in such a way as to empower the Postmaster General to reduce further even the inadequate rates which it names. This would be virtually the delegation to him of the rate-making power. He stands toward the railroads in the relation of a shipper, and it hardly seems that any argument is needed to support the contention that the shipper should not, in justice, be allowed to make and enforce rates.

One of the fundamental troubles with the Moon bill is that it proposes to base the pay of the railroad on an entirely wrong principle, which has come to be called the "space plan." This means that the Post Office Department will "authorize" on the various trains whatever car space it thinks it needs—a full car, a half car, a quarter car, or 3 feet or 7 feet of space in baggage cars. It would pay for the space at mileage rates, either those named in the bill or such lower ones as the Postmaster General might decide upon, irrespective of the loads carried.

The scale of rates named in the bill would yield about 23 cents per mile for a 60-foot car. A full carload of 20 tons of parcel post would then give the railroad a rate of 1.15 cents per ton per mile. Even if the car was only half filled, the return to the railroad would be but 2.3 cents per ton per mile. This would be a low rate for merchandise freight carried in freight trains, and for such service performed in passenger trains it would be confiscatory. Moreover, as has been explained, the rates could be made still lower under the discretionary power which the Moon bill would confer on the Postmaster General.

WEIGHT, NOT SPACE, THE TRUE BASIS.

The defect of the "space plan," as may be readily seen, is that it does not base the pay of the railroads upon the actual service rendered. The service of carrying things—whether mail, freight, parcel post, or express—consists in the hauling of a given weight a given distance. It is measured by the ton-mile. The service is not the hauling of a car. The car is merely the instrument by which the service is performed.

Justice and fair business dealing demand that the railroads shall be paid for the service of carrying the mails on the weight-and-distance basis, the world standard for such service. This is provided for in the present law, but certain imperfections of the established law and practice need correction.

Congress should deal with the situation by remedying the known defects in the present system without destroying its correct basic principle. Chief among the needed reforms would be to have the mails weighed at least once a year instead of once every four years, which is the practice now followed by the Post Office Department.

Certainly it is inconsistent for the department to refuse to pay the railroads on the weight-and-distance basis when it uses that identical basis itself in fixing the postage which it charges the users of the parcel post.

There is no doubt that the passage of the Moon bill would permit a great expansion in the parcel post, because it would enable the Post Office Department to exact service from the railroads at less than cost. Give an express company a similar privilege and it could monopolize the carrying traffic.

EFFECT ON TRAVELING PUBLIC.

But would it be fair to those who have put their savings into the railroads to do this? Would it be beneficial to the public at large to have thousands of tons of what is nothing in the world but common freight transferred from the freight trains to the passenger trains, slowing down the service of the latter and inconveniencing passengers?

The House of Representatives Post Office Committee this year again made the Moon bill a "rider" on the Post Office appropriation bill, despite the protests of the railroads against the measure itself and against the use of the "rider" method, in the attempt to force its enactment.

The railroads want nothing but fair play in this matter. They are convinced that they will not get it under the Moon bill. The Post Office Department, on its side, is unwilling to recede from its insistence upon the enactment of that measure.

Does it not seem that the time has now arrived when this technical and complicated subject should be turned over to the Government body best fitted to decide questions of railroad rates—the Interstate Commerce Commission?

This is the suggestion that the railroads make, confident that it will win the approval of the American people as the wisest and fairest solution of the problem.

RALPH PETERS, Chairman.

NEW YORK, February 21.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, that is an improved, revised letter or statement made by the president of the railway association and their chief counsel in their case against the people of the United States. It is the same letter, it is the same sentiment, that has been placed in the mouth of every railroad lawyer and every railroad representative in the Unted States, pleading against the cause of justice for the people. It is the same that from the time the bill passed a year ago has been uttered in part by the stereotyped resolutions from chambers of commerce all over the country; and yet read it, and there is nothing in it but conclusions—conclusions based not upon facts, but conclusions boldly and brazenly drawn by the representatives of the railroads in their own interest. Against that document, sir, I propose to present the judgment of two commissions appointed by the House and the Senate to dispose of this question, the judgment of the last commission upon the question vitally affecting these interests being placed in this bill; the judgment of the Post Office Department and statisticians; the judgment of a Republican and of a Democratic administration; the judgment of the Post Office Committee, not only of the House but of the Senate, upon a full and with a free hearing of all the facts. Of course they do not want this law. They want to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, if they can, and there litigate for 20 years while they make exactions from the Treasury of the United States. That is all there is in it. You know, I know, every man who is not a common fool knows, that unless you go from the present basis, inadequate, inaccurate, and dishonest in its enforcement in every way, to a space basis that will be just, accurate, and true, the parcel-post law of the United States is a dead letter, and the rights of the people in this service are no longer to be respected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The views expressed in the letter just read are the views of the chairman of a railway mail pay committee, expressed on behalf of the railroads of the country. The gentleman would not deny the right of these gentlemen, who have vast interests at stake, to have their views presented to the House, would he?

Mr. MOON. No one denies their right to present them here or anywhere else. Upon the contrary, they have been presented before the commissions month after month, and those commissions have decided against them. They have been presented before this committee. Of course they have the right to present them, but in presenting them I submit that something more than mere conclusions in the interest of corporations ought to be given against the right of the people of the United States to protect their mail and the people from exorbitant rates and charges. Why is it that they want to maintain a system under which they can not come within $15,000,000 per annum, as admitted by the department in administrations heretofore, of the proper pay? Why is it that they want to maintain a system that is unscientific and incorrect? Why is it they want a system by which mails may be weighed and diverted, both legally and illegally, from one section to the other? Why is it that they want to maintain a system under which in thirty-odd years there has been an abnormal growth in the mail pay of the United States from $7,000,000 to $60,000,000? Why do they want that, instead of the system proposed by this bill? Of course it is their selfish interest and nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I can realize the earnestness of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and the earnestness displayed by all the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to pass this bill. I can understand why it is popular now, as it has been during the last few years from the public rostrum everywhere, to denounce railroads and corporations. Any man in a representative body who undertakes to bespeak fair play for corporations or for railroads may expect immediately to be denounced with some show of applause from the galleries as being the friend of corporate interests and of railroads and all that is obnoxious in that regard.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I have not charged the gentleman with being the friend of corporate interests as against the people. If he wants to assume that attitude, it is for him and not for me. I do not charge him with it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I accept the gentleman's statement. The gentleman charged in the very opening of his remarks, however, that the argument made by Mr. PETERS was substantially that of every railroad lawyer. It seemed to me that it was fair that Mr. PETERS's argument should be presented, especially as the railroads have been denounced for attempting to loot the Government.

Mr. MOON. Oh, of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that it might be presented without the charge, which I think the gentleman did make in his statement, that it was the same argument made by all of the railroad attorneys.

Mr. MOON. Of course it is the same, but that does not imply that the gentleman standing here in his place has no right to present anything that he desires, either for the railroads or against them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not intend to take the gentleman's remarks as personal and I have absolved him from any such insinuation. I do not so accuse him. I repeat, however, that it is perfectly easy in these times for any Representative who seeks public applause or for one who seeks to put through a measure to which he is wedded, as a rider upon an appropriation bill——

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. May I ask the gentleman what basis of railway mail pay he thinks is proper and right?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would say that if the Interstate Commerce Commission, rather than a Postmaster General, who may act from a political motive, fixed the rates they would probably be satisfactory all around.

Mr. FINLEY. On the basis of weight or space?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On weight and actual service rendered, not on a fictitious service or that service which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] seems to be pleading for, which makes the railroads pay for the purpose of proving to the public, the parcel-post sending public, that if you make the railroads do it for nothing, or thereabouts, that therefore you can do it more cheaply through the Government than you can through separate corporations.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make any statement or inference that my remarks were of that character?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman said that the railroad companies were paying their employees more and the express companies were paying their employees less, or something like that.

Mr. LEWIS. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS. I compared the postal employees with the express companies' employees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I may have misunderstood the gentleman, and probably did. I understood him to say, however, that the Parcel Post Service of the Government was a success; and my comment is that, of course, it can be a success and can be economically conducted if you force the railroad companies to do it for nothing.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the gentleman mean to imply that I have any such idea?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman seems willing to force the railroad companies to render this service to the Government cheaper than they would render it to individuals.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is guessing about me. He is in error, and he will have to guess again.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let us see about this: The fact is, and it is shown by this bill, that the Federal Government proposes to take from the railroad companies service for which they do not propose to pay more than one-half as a rule what individuals would pay for the same service, and in that kind of competition of course the Postal Department can make a good showing.

Now, I want to say this before I close: It is very popular to denounce corporations. It is easy to get applause from the galleries by saying that the railroad companies grind down the people and attempt to loot the Treasury. In the interest of fair play I sent to the Clerk's desk a little while ago, without any knowledge of the writer, a statement which was intended to present the railroad's side of the question. Why should it not be presented? Are we legislating only for one side?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. We all know from reading the court reports and reading the investigations that the railroad bosses loot their own treasury; then, my God, why should not they loot the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would not attempt to divorce the gentleman from his cyclonic views for anything in the world [applause], because it would spoil his reputation as a friend of the downtrodden—of that 5,000,000 of the 8,000,000 farmers of the country who, according to the gentleman from Texas, have chattel mortgages upon their backs—a statement which I think can not be proven.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, as one of the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I have been perhaps unfamiliar with the conditions which prevailed in years gone by, but with at least a fair knowledge of what has transpired before that committee this year. I have sat here in my place during all these hours of debate and listened to the tirades of certain gentlemen of this House in casting reflections upon the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and upon their ability to serve this Nation as Representatives on that committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say in the beginning that I believe your committee was appointed to serve the people of this Nation and not the railroads of the Nation. [Applause.] I have in mind your committee did serve the people of the Nation notwithstanding that some of the able arguments on the other side have been more to protect the railroads than they were to protect the people whom they have been sent here to represent. Mr. Chairman, I want to quote the RECORD to prove some assertions that have been made, calling attention to the documents that we have received in this House while members of that committee. I said before on the floor of this House that even before your committee was appointed, before Congress had convened, we were receiving documents and resolution after resolution from the different merchants' associations, boards of trade, and chambers of commerce throughout these United States complaining that the Post Office Committee was not going to be fair to the railroads, before one single statement had been made by any member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Chairman, your committee has been fair in this matter. They have sat and listened to all the arguments that have been delivered before that committee by the very able and paid attorneys of the railroad interests. They have tried to deal fairly with the railroads. We want the railroads to get what they are justly entitled to and we want the people of the United States to get that to which they are justly entitled. Now, I said that these reports and these resolutions had been sent in here by the chambers of commerce, with the whip of the railroads over their backs, and it can not be denied. Only Saturday, in my State, a gentleman representing the Interstate Commerce Commission in a hearing of the New Haven Railroad, one of the railroads whom the gentleman says is now in the hands of a receiver, one of the railroads where if the directors of that railroad got their just deserts they would be doing time down in Atlanta [applause], this railroad which took from the people of the State of Massachusetts $300,000,000 and wrecked two of the best paying railroads in the United States—the New Haven and the Boston & Maine—until the Legislature of Massachusetts and the United States Government had to come in and take away from the New Haven the Boston & Maine Railroad and put it in the hands of a board of trustees in order to protect the people of the State. These railroads have control of boards of trade and chambers of commerce, and I am going to ask you to give me a few moments of your time so that I may read what an attorney of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a hearing in Massachusetts, said only last Saturday. Mr. Larue Brown, representing the Interstate Commerce Commission, said this, and I understand it to be a fact that the New Haven Road and the New Haven Railroad trustees are members of the Merchants' Association of New York, who have been criticizing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Mr. Brown said this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAGUE. He says:

I know it to be a fact that the New Haven road has had its very best men bringing influences to bear on influential members of this association—

Bringing their influences there as well as before the Congress of the United States—

(Rhode Island Business Men's Association) in this vicinity so that the answer to Congressman O'SHAUNESSY'S letter would be favorable to the retention of the Sound lines by the New Haven. I am in a position to know whereof I speak. Furthermore it is my opinion that the New Haven road really dictates the policies of several of these boards of trade and chambers of commerce in New England, so that when one of these organizations send their opinions it is in reality the opinion and desires of the New Haven road.

I wish you would also bear in mind that a large majority of business men in New England are in dread to antagonize the New Haven for fear of the many different methods the New Haven now and in the past used against them whenever they do anything that interferes with the New Haven policy.

And it is to the conduct of this great commission that these railroads now want this proposition to be presented.

During all the hearings, Mr. Chairman—and I went into every meeting that was held—the one and the only contention of the railroads was that "We want this matter placed before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we do not want you to rule upon it at all." That was the intention of these railroads when they came there, and when in the committee I asked of Mr. Peters, the representative of the association of railroad men, whether or not the merchants' association, that seemed to be the leader of these commissions on resolutions, was controlled by the railroad interests, Mr. Peters said this—I said to him:

Is the Merchants' Association of New York made up of railroad men? Are there railroad men in the merchants' association?

He said:

I think there are some of them in the merchants' association. I am one of them.

Do you want us to take as the opinion of the people of the United States the opinion of an organization made up, as that organization is, of the very men who have wrecked the railroad situation in the United States of America and have laid bare the finest rolling stock that was ever known in the United States, in my own section of the country?

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. I will.

Mr. PLATT. What proportion of railroad men is there in the Merchants' Association of New York City?

Mr. TAGUE. The men who to-day control the railroads of the United States, the representatives of the Morgans and men allied with them.

Mr. PLATT. What proportion are they of the Merchants' Association of New York City?

Mr. TAGUE. I do not know.

Mr. PLATT. Of course. They are an infinitesimal part. You are talking to the galleries, and do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. TAGUE. I know more about it than you do.

Mr. PLATT. You do not know anything about the Merchants' Association of New York City.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentlemen are not addressing themselves to the question under consideration.

Mr. TAGUE. I know this about the merchants' association: I do not intend to indict all the members of that association, but I do say that the dominant faction of the merchants' association is composed of the gentlemen who are now appealing to the Congress to protect them in their ill-gotten gains.

Mr. PLATT. I deny that statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Admitting that there is a prejudice against the management of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, is that any reason why we should not give other railroads a square deal in the matter of this railway-mail pay?

Mr. TAGUE. I said in the beginning that your committee was not biased and listened attentively to all the contentions of the railroads, and we have brought in here what we consider a fair and honest bill from every angle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would not prejudice all the railroads of the country because he does not like the New York, New Haven & Hartford management?

Mr. TAGUE. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I was trying to argue awhile ago. It is so easy to carry a bill with prejudice.

Mr. TAGUE. Oh, no. I am speaking now of the railroads of my own section of the country. I happen to know something about the New Haven and the Boston & Maine situation, because I served in my State legislature when that particular legislature was the cause of the dissolution of those two railroads, and I know who the people are that wrecked those roads, and it is on file here in Washington.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has alluded to the Merchants' Association of New York City. I would like to ask if he likewise makes the charge that the Boston Chamber of Commerce is controlled by the railroads?

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether they are or not. But let me say this, that I do know that the Boston Chamber of Commerce is made up, too, of the men who make up the railroad interests of our State and the men who are appealing against this legislation. I claim that their appeal against this legislation is biased and that they are controlling the doctrine of that organization. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that because a man happens to be a director or a stockholder in a railroad he therefore should be excluded from membership in bodies of that sort?

Mr. TAGUE. On the contrary; no. But I say he should be excluded from voting upon a resolution that is in his own selfish interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, as to the statement that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] has just made concerning the Merchants' Association of New York, if the gentleman intends to charge that it is controlled, either properly or improperly, by railroad influence as against the interests of the general public, the statement of the gentleman is absolutely wrong.

Mr. TAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. TAGUE. I have not said it was controlled. I do not believe the records will say that I have said that. I have said, and I repeat it to the gentleman, that when an association attempts to come to Congress and file a resolution—an association made up of men who are looking for legislation—then they are not doing fairly by the rest of the country.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I must confess I do not understand the English of the gentleman. I do not know yet what he charges. But I will state in one or two sentences about what the Merchants' Association is.

Mr. TAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. For what?

Mr. TAGUE. So that perhaps I may enlighten him. I will try hard enough. Perhaps my English is not perfect.

Mr. BENNET. I was not criticizing you for that.

Mr. TAGUE. I want to say to the gentleman this, that when the resolution of the Merchants' Association was before the committee I tried to ascertain whether the Merchants' Association was made up of railroad men petitioning for this legislation, and I asked them that.

Mr. BENNET. Who?

Mr. TAGUE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say just what I did say. I asked, "Is the Merchants' Association of New York made up of railroad men?" He said, "I think there are some railroad men in its membership and I am one of them." Mr. Peters, the man appearing before the committee—Mr. Peters, the president of the Long Island Railroad, I believe, working for legislation—had his association petition Congress to hear him in his own cause.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it is just as fair to call the Merchants' Association of New York Mr. Peters's association because he happened to belong to it as it would be to call the Baptist Church the church of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] because he is an honored member of it. The Merchants' Association of New York—and I do not happen to be a member of it—is an association of firms and individuals numbering probably five or six thousand. The president of the association at the time, I believe, is Mr. Marble, president of the R. & G. Corset Co., and the association is made up largely of shippers.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts evidently does not know that for years one of the functions of this association was, and still is, that of fighting railroad rates in behalf of the city of New York and its shippers, and that there is not a day in the year when they have not a proceeding pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission to fight a railroad rate. In the years 1908 and 1909 the association, through Mr. Nathan Bijur, now one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, appeared in New York and all over the United States in a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission in opposition to the railroads of the country; and yet the gentleman gets up here and says that the Merchants' Association of New York is a railroad association. I have no knowledge of who the members are. I do not know who the directors in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad are. But the gentleman has made a sweeping charge there. He said that the directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad are members of the Merchants' Association of New York. I will ask the gentleman who they are?

Mr. TAGUE. I have not the names offhand, but I will file the names for the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman says he will file them. I ask permission, by unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that those names be inserted either in the gentleman's remarks or in mine. Let them be inserted in the gentleman's remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this data when furnished shall be inserted—as a part of whose remarks?

Mr. BENNET. Those of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. Inserted in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am getting a little bit weary, every time an association from a large city sends in a protest, of having it immediately denominated in some way which ascribes to it wrongful motives. I contend now, and shall contend, that the Merchants' Association of New York, that the Chamber of Commerce of New York, that The Bronx Board of Trade, that the Harlem Chamber of Commerce, or any other of a dozen reputable commercial organizations of the city which I, in part, represent, has an absolute right at any time to submit its views and its protests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on this paragraph. I ask that the Clerk read. The gentleman can speak later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate close on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read a little.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will it be in order to strike out the section at the conclusion of the reading of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it will be. Without objection, all pro forma amendments to this paragraph are withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The gentleman from Illinois made the very picturesque statement that if the weight limit should happen to be increased by the parcel-post authorities to 100 pounds, the post office would have to secure a lot of special instruments; in fact, he used the word "derrick." I ask him whether he knows that the postal regulations call for a weight limit of 150 pounds in the mail sack, and that the mail sack, which is the handling unit for the Postal Service, is allowed itself to reach 150 pounds?

Mr. MADDEN. I assume, if the gentleman says so, it is true.

Mr. LEWIS. The postal regulations themselves provide that.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman another question, and I want his attention to it. If the gentleman is unwilling to trust the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to develop the parcel post and to determine its weight limit and other incidents, I ask him how can he trust the Postmaster General alone to determine the rates to be paid the railroads of this country? I ask an answer.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman declines to answer, I must suggest the significance of the question. This bill—and I am not criticizing the bill in that respect—does give the Postmaster General the power as an official and as a sworn official—who up to date has never committed any wrong that I know of—to determine whether the railroads shall receive the rates provided in this bill or some lower rates. He can be intrusted, according to the bill, with the power to say in a controversy between himself and the railroads how much or how little the railroads shall receive. That is the logic, and that is the philosophy, of the gentleman from Illinois not 20 minutes since defended by him upon this floor.

If that be true, if the Postmaster General alone, without the Interstate Commerce Commission, can be trusted with a power like that in a controversy where he himself is involved, then I want to know from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] why the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, both, can not be trusted to do for the parcel post in the way of development what the Interstate Commerce Commission is intrusted to do with railroad rates and express rates.

I see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] rising. I am not criticising that provision in the bill. I know that Government officials can be trusted. I know that there is a line of division between legislative work and administrative work. I know that making parcel-post rates, weight limits, and other incidents of that service is not a legislative function. It is an administrative function, and the Congress adopted that view some years ago when it reposed the function in the quarters where it is now placed. I want to know why it should be taken away. There must be some purpose. What is the purpose? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has abandoned the argument he made on Saturday about diverting freight from the railroads to the Parcel Post Service. The average rate a railroad gets for moving a pound of traffic is just 1 mill. The lowest parcel-post rate is 1 cent, or 10 mills. So there can not be anything in the argument about diversion of the freight traffic from the railroads to the Post Office. Anyhow, if that were involved, the express companies are doing the same thing, because their rates for the higher weights are lower than the parcel-post rate.

I should like to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] answer the two questions I have put to him: If a mail bag can weigh 150 pounds with no complaint, why can not a parcel weigh 100 pounds, as it can in all the other parcel-post establishments? And again, if the Postmaster General can be trusted to determine whether the railroads of this country shall get 25 cents a car-mile or 20 cents a car-mile, why can not the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, on a public subject, where private rights are not involved, be trusted with the mere incidents of the development of this transportation agency. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 22, after the word "proper," insert the following: "Provided, That no railroad with less than 100 miles of trackage shall be required to provide a steel car for carrying the mails."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to a point of order. It simply provides a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I maintain that this is not germane to the paragraph to which it is offered. The law now provides that the Postmaster General may fix the compensation for railway postal cars not made of steel or other noncombustible material, and it requires that all the full railway postal cars in the service after the 1st of July, 1917, shall be of steel or other equally indestructible material, and that between now and that period 25 per cent of steel equipment shall continue to be put into the service annually. That is in the paragraph on page 43, which has been passed. The present section of the bill does not deal with the character of the equipment. It simply deals with the maintenance, the heating, lighting, and cleaning of the car. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not germane.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the amendment is germane. The paragraph provides that if any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars, and so forth, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, and so forth, be deemed proper. Now, the purpose——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks the amendment is germane. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to cover one of the manifest defects of this bill. I think it is patent to those who have followed the discussion since this bill has been under consideration that there is a discrimination here in the exercise of power by the Postmaster General as against the short-line railroads. It is known to a great many Members that numerous small railroads now have great difficulty in complying with various Government regulations. It is a question whether some of them can continue to exist and keep on making the reports that are now required to the made to the Government in various ways.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the railroad men who appeared before the committee have generally admitted that this bill increases the pay of the short-line railroads and that the distribution of pay in this bill will be more favorable to the short-line railroads than the existing law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard other railroad men say to the contrary, and I happen to know of one or two small railroads that will have very great difficulty indeed in providing $9,000 or $10,000 to purchase a steel car, and it would not be warranted by the business they do in carrying the mails. The gentleman and his whole array of railroad experts appearing before the committee can not deny the facts as adduced in special instances. Take a small railroad running 14 or 15 miles along the coast, connecting up one city with another for the accommodation of people who want to get to market as well as to get their mail every morning. They can get it only through this little railroad. You make the owners buy steel cars that cost $9,000 or $10,000 apiece for the privilege of carrying the mails to accommodate the people.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For a question only.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to assume responsibility for the deaths that may occur because of the continued use of wooden cars?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They have been in use since the beginning of railroad service. In the case of these small roads there seems to be no other way to do it. I know of one little railroad near Washington that connects up certain small towns that would be deprived of communication with this Capital if steel cars were insisted upon. That railroad could not afford to spend $9,000 or $10,000 to comply with the requirements of this bill.

This Congress passed a bill providing for the government of the Panama Canal. It was not a bill to regulate railroads or steamship companies; but within the last two or three weeks, by reason of a rider in that bill divorcing railroad and steamship companies, six or seven small steamboat lines on Chesapeake Bay have been discontinued, and the people are unable to get to the centers of population where they were formerly accustomed to go. That is one of the effects of your rider legislation. You are imposing all sorts of efficiency regulations upon these small and unprofitable roads, making it difficult for them to operate. I am informed that only during the last few days the Interstate Commerce Commission has provided that the full reports, such as are made by the larger railroads, shall not be required of these smaller railroads that are endeavoring to serve rural communities, and are doing it without profit.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this bill that requires a steel car on the railroad to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred. If he had read the bill, if he had given as much attention to the consideration of the bill as some of the rest of us, he would have known it and his speech would have been unnecessary. The only steel car that is required is where there is a full railway post-office car. A full railway post-office car is not used on any of these little lines which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That answers the gentleman's colleague [Mr. MADDEN], who asked whether or not we could continue the use of wooden cars in this instance. Evidently the gentleman from Illinois has answered his colleague, and we are going back to the wooden cars. Why not say so in the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Because it might as well be said in the amendment that black is not white. Black is not white and so let us asseverate it; let us legislate that black is not white, but what is the use? We know that it is not, and we would not add anything to it by legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provisions of this act shall apply to service operated by railroad companies partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 17, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 45, line 17, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

Mr. MANN. I will say that the word "act" appears a number of times in this section, and I think it should be changed each time to "section." That was done when the bill was before the House at the last session.

Mr. MOON. Yes; that was done before, and the change ought to be made.

Mr. MANN. In some cases to leave the word "act" in the bill would lead to trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provisions of this act respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 20, the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, page 45, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, and hereafter detailed estimates shall be submitted for such services in the annual Book of Estimates.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 7, the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 7, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and, where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this act, to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in line 23, I move to strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 23, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, under the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, of course, any rate that is promulgated by the Postmaster General that is confiscatory is unconsitutional. This particular section is a pretty good indication, in the attempt that it makes, of the fact that the rates granted the railroads are not fair rates, because otherwise there would be no statute necessary to make the railroads carry the mails. It is a little bit uncertain just how often the Postmaster General could attempt to collect the $5,000. Under the Bourne bill it was specifically provided that he could collect at the rate of $5,000 a day. I am not certain but that under this bill he would attempt to collect at the same rate for refusal to carry the mails at any rate he fixed until the railroads went into the court and proved that the rates were unlawful.

This simply says—and I guess the whole section 17 opens the door, because if the rates are confiscatory they are illegal, and under the fifth amendment rates would have to be proper rates. The provision is absolutely useless, because if the rates are proper the railroads will be glad to carry the mails, and if they are confiscatory you could not make them carry them. Therefore it is absolutely futile to put this language in.

Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. He gave me a lecture on law the other day, and his lecture was all right, but I would like to ask him this question: I have in mind two railroads, one entirely in the State of New York and another entirely in the State of Virginia. One of these railroads to-day carries the mails and the other refuses to carry the mails, as it has a right to do. I would like to ask the chairman if he thinks that the Postmaster General has the right to go into the State of Tennessee in connection with a railroad operated entirely within the State of Tennessee and attempt to compel that railroad to carry the mails under any circumstances?

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman desire me to answer the question and give my reasons or just answer the question?

Mr. BENNET. I think it would be illuminating if the gentleman would give the reasons.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to say it, in the first place, the objection made to this section by the gentleman and his statement that it ought not to go into the bill, because the railroad companies would not refuse to carry the mail, of course, is one that we could not seriously consider. The question here is one of the legitimate exercise of the Federal power. Under the law to-day a railroad company may refuse to enter into a contract to carry the mail for the amount specified in the statute, and as the law stands I am of opinion that they could lawfully refuse to do so. It is that condition that we want to remedy. We want to make it impossible for railroad companies to refuse to carry the mail unless they do so resting upon a constitutional right. There are many powers under the Federal Constitution that have not been developed. Many have been developed under serious and trying circumstances. There are many more to be developed. The gentleman will remember the Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads. That power lies dormant in the Constitution until vitality is given to it by an act of Congress. That has not been done in all cases, but whenever Congress declares that any road shall be a post road then the jurisdiction by Congress is assumed for the exercise of its complete power and monopoly under the Constitution to carry the mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the first part of this section provides that the Postmaster General may state the routes. That is the legislative authority in pursuance of that provision of the Constitution to which I have referred. It is the assumption of Federal authority and power over the roads for the carrying of the mail. Is it to be said, when a power is granted under the Federal Constitution to Congress and Congress gives vitality to that power by legislation and commands what, in pursuance to the Constitution, shall be done, that any railroad in the United States, any transportation company that can carry the mail, which is nothing but a public-service corporation, shall not be subject to the jurisdiction of Congress for that purpose? If that be true, then the power of the Federal Government under the Constitution would be worth nothing. It is not a power that conflicts with the State authority; it is an exclusive Federal power, and excludes all State authority; and where the Federal Government takes jurisdiction for one purpose, particularly under the section of the Constitution that gives it the monopoly, that power is exclusive, and obedience must be yielded to it, not only by roads passing from one State to another but by intrastate roads. It is not under the commerce clause of the Constitution that this power is sought; it is under that section of the Constitution yet dormant until vitalized by the action of this Congress that the right to name all post roads exists, carrying with that power the right to say how and when it shall be exercised, subject alone to another provision of the Constitution, and if that other provision of the Constitution did not exist the Federal power would be complete and plenary and no question could be made about it.

But there is another provision of the Constitution—and both sections of the Constitution must be construed together—and that other provision of the Constitution is that private property shall not be taken for public use or purposes without just compensation. That has been construed to mean not only the body of the property itself but the increment, the increase, that comes by its use. So there is but one exception to this right under the exercise of Federal power, and that is that it be exercised in accordance with this section that I have just mentioned. If the rates fixed under the bill were confiscatory, the act would be void for that reason, but so long as the rates are remunerative, so long as they are not confiscatory, obedience is yielded to that section of the Constitution, and the Federal Government is absolutely supreme upon this question. I think the quicker we settle and bring out all the dormant powers of the Federal Government—the quicker we determine where the line of demarcation is made—the better. For myself, I am a very firm believer in the doctrine that the Federal Government shall not encroach upon any sovereign rights of the States, that the Federal Government must live within the powers delegated by the Constitution, but where the Constitution does delegate a power I believe the Federal Government is supreme and can operate under this provision of the Constitution at will, regardless of State lines. It is a Federal and not a State right that we are exercising.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the able and scholarly argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, tending somewhat though, I think, toward the doctrines of Alexander Hamilton, has convinced me that the provision ought at least to receive consideration, and that no attempt ought to be made here to strike it from the bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the rates specified in this act shall have been adopted, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, whenever requested by the Postmaster General or by the representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying mail, make an investigation of the justice and reasonableness of rates then in effect, grant hearings to parties in interest, and report to Congress at the earliest practicable date thereafter the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein should be increased or decreased, and if either, how much. Such report shall show for each steam railroad operating company, if practicable, the amount of mail service rendered, the cost of performing same, and a comparison of the earnings of such railroad company from the mail traffic with those from express traffic and other passenger-train traffic. For the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and the first six words of line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "and fix the rates which the Postmaster General shall allow the railroads as compensation for transporting the mails."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is not subject to the point of order. Let the gentleman make the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will turn to the bill, on page 48 they will see that I seek to strike from it this language:

And report to Congress at the earliest practicable date thereafter the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein shall be increased or decreased, and if either, how much.

This paragraph in the bill empowers the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the request of the Postmaster General or 51 per cent of the railways of the United States on petition or request, to refer the subject of railway mail pay to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to report its findings to Congress. The amendment offered proposes to change it in no respect except after it is referred and full investigation has been given, that the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to rates for carrying the mail, whether an increase or a decrease in pay, shall be the rate allowed by the Postmaster General for compensation therefor.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much said about the power of the Postmaster General. He has great power. It has at times been unwisely exercised. I will not make it stronger than that. There is a maximum, and when this bill is enacted into law, if it shall be enacted into law, the Postmaster General will have the power to cut the rates in two or make them whatever he may choose below the maximum rates fixed by law. That is a power, you will say, that will not be exercised and has not been exercised. I believe that is true, but there is the power given to one man. Now, gentlemen in discussing thi bill, especially my colleague [Mr. MADDEN], in his exceedingly able speech that he made in general debate—which I listened to and which I read with great care—said that Congress has the whip hand. Yes; Congress can enact and is enacting about the railway mail pay and could fix the railway mail pay by express enactment, but here they clothe the Postmaster General with power. Here is an effort to clothe with power the Interstate Commerce Commission also.

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does my colleague contend that because of the fact that we give the Postmaster General discretionary power, as we always have done, that that is clothing him with power to fix the rates?

Mr. CANNON. Well, practically; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I am sorry I can not agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. CANNON. Well, what does the discretion amount to, I will ask my colleague? A maximum is fixed and discretion is granted to the Postmaster General to pay less than the maximum.

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague allow me to ask him one more question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does he remember any Postmaster General in all the history within the gentleman's long experience, who has exercised the discretion?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not; but these be strange times [applause], and I can prove it by my rural-delivery friends here, and I am one of them myself. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be granted five minutes additional.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unaimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended until he concludes his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that his time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. CANNON. I wish I could have a little more; then I would not have to be thinking about the end of the five minutes. I will not weary the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think the time had better be fixed.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, my request, I believe, was the first one made—that the gentleman have such time as he desired in order to conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if my colleague was not to be interrupted, I would not object to that; but knowing how other gentlemen will take up his time, I shall have to object to anything but a fixed time.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have 10 minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much time of the House during this session.

Now, then, the gentlemen composing this committee, able as they are—and especially my colleague Mr. MADDEN—say they are not experts as to railway mail pay. No; we are not experts, and yet I do not know of a man on the floor of the House who is more of an expert than the gentleman, yet I dare say he would not undertake perhaps to fix the schedules for railway mail pay. Here are 435 Members. What I do not know about this bill—and I have listened to the whole consideration, with all its complications and provisos, with my want of knowledge upon these technical questions—what I do not know about it would make a library. [Laughter.] I mean as to the proper mail pay in amount. Now, I do not seek to amend the bill; I do not try to say that it shall not go into effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed the rates—and you propose to fix the rates here with all of these qualifications and provisions—but the object of the proposition is if after trial it is found that these rates are too low or too high—and gentlemen of this committee say that they are to be increased; I believe there is no dispute about that——

Mr. MADDEN. About the rates?

Mr. CANNON. That they are to be increased; that the effect of this bill will be to increase the railway mail pay.

Mr. MADDEN. At least 2 cents per ton-mile.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. Then, if they ought to be increased, let us increase them; but suppose that after actual test they ought to be increased. Suppose that the rates are not enough or are too much. Gentlemen say that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall report to Congress, and this bill provides that it shall report to Congress and then Congress can act. My amendment says that the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix the rates.

Mr. Chairman, the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rates for transportation of the products of 100,000,000 of our people. Well, who compose the United States? One hundred millions of people. The same people who compose the United States we are legislating for, and if the United States pays the bill, should not that same 100,000,000 people, who have all their business regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission under existing law as to transportation, be content that the Interstate Commerce Commission, after an investigation provided for in this bill, should fix the rate for transportation of the mail?

Now, then, much has been said about railroads. I am not an enemy of railroads. They are capitalized at a little under $70,000 a mile, less than half the capitalization of the railways of the world. Our freight tariffs, our passenger tariffs, are less than half the freight and passenger tariffs of the world, and we have half of the railroad mileage of the world. We pay twice as much for the operation of our railways as is paid by the rest of the world. We are getting along fairly well. Once in a while a man, given to sharp practice, gets control of a railroad. Once in a while a man, given to sharp practice, wrecks a bank. Once in a while a preacher goes wrong, and once in two whiles a lawyer goes wrong. [Laughter.] Once in three whiles a Member of Congress goes wrong. [Laughter.] Therefore what is the use of abusing a whole system because somebody has gone wrong?

Oh, how we agonized to get these common carriers! We issued county, State, and city bonds to get them; donated rights of way, and all that kind of thing, and burned our corn because we had no way to get it to market. And we have this great system, owned by great numbers of people. Insurance companies, trust companies, and great blocks of people own these railroads. We want to deal justly by them, no more, no less, and it does not lie on my tongue to stand and declaim against them. If you would stop their service for 10 days you would starve. Therefore they should be dealt with justly. I do not know whether they are getting too much or too little from the hundred millions of people that we call "Uncle Sam" for their service. If I did know and had supreme power, I would say, "Let it be just that." We are devising machinery to give them what they ought to have.

And, in conclusion, let me say that the hundred millions of people who constitute the United States to-day and who have their rates fixed, certainly can trust the same administrative power, the Interstate Commerce Commission, when these matters are left, as the bill provides, by the Postmaster General, or by 51 per cent of the railways, to fully investigate. And when they have investigated and found what the rates should be, then let the orders of the commission be the rate. And if this amendment is adopted, those will be the rates. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I very fully concur with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that under all circumstances and conditions the railroad companies of the United States ought to be treated properly. They are great factors in our civilization, our commerce, and in the business world, and I am sure that none of us ought to want to do them any injustice.

We have now come to that section of the bill which the gentleman proposes to amend by striking out the language giving effect to the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission to be granted to 51 per cent of the roads and keeping it from being reported to Congress. The language that he would strike out and insert would leave this condition: Fifty-one per cent of the railroads would be before the Interstate Commerce Commission to have determined the rates at which they could carry the mails. Now, it is possible that the Postmaster General might not like the rates granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is possible that the Interstate Commerce Commission would not fix rates that would be acceptable to these railroads. I do not believe it would be wise to leave the ultimate decision of a legislative proposition like this, and one of legislative discretion, to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It ought not arbitrarily to have the power to say that the rate the Postmaster General proposes to fix, and that the railroads are combating, or that the railroads propose and the Postmaster General is combating, shall be the law. The better course is that provided in this bill, it seems to me, to have specific findings to see whether the rates should be increased or decreased, and, if either, how much. It leaves to us that power that we ought never to delegate to any commission. Congress ought to retain the ultimate right to legislate in this matter. It ought not to confer it upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. It ought not to be done in the interest of the roads. It ought not to be done in the interest of the Postmaster General or the Government. We ought to hold our authority under the constitutional right that we have to determine this question and let these servants of the Congress report these facts, give their conclusion and the reasons they have, and let us then determine, as the body having supreme right and control, whether we will accept the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the views of the Postmaster General, and legislate as we may deem best.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not a fact that in any controversy between the railroads and the War Department, or between the railroads and the Navy Department, that they must go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and thrash it out and abide by the decision of that commission?

Mr. MOON. That is in reference to some question of freight rates between the department and the railroads. That does not control the mail of the United States, and it does not involve the question that is involved here.

Mr. TILSON. It is a department having important business with the railroads, and a large business.

Mr. MOON. It has been the habit of this Congress for a number of years, and it is our habit now, to cast off the obligations belonging to us as Representatives and imposing them upon commissions and committees and bodies of that sort. It is a very dangerous thing to do. On a great question like this, affecting the revenues to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, we ought not to surrender our jurisdiction to any commission.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. You speak of "our." I suppose you mean Congress determining the amount that ought to be paid?

Mr. MOON. I think Congress ought to reserve the right to ultimately determine, and to use any committee it sees fit——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. How many committees have there been, and how long has it taken them to come even to the conclusion you have now reached? I think it is 15 years, is it not?

Mr. MOON. The railroads have fought it off for 20 years. As long as you are sending it to commissions and committees you are going to be dominated by the corporations of this country.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman, if we send it to the Interstate Commerce Commission with the same power that the commission has now with reference to War Department business, or Treasury Department business, or any Government business, and let that decision be made in the ordinary way, subject to an appeal to the court, whether you will not get a better result?

Mr. MOON. No; I do not think so. I think that Congress is the immediate representative of the people, and when you have authorized as auxiliary to yourself a commission like the Interstate Commerce Commission, as we now provide, to sit and investigate a matter for us and report it to us, we are then in a position to determine the equities between the railroads and the departments, and we are reserving the supreme right of the sovereign which we have been giving away here from time to time heretofore.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Are we not a rather unwieldy body for that purpose, with two Houses?

Mr. MOON. Yes. I know we are a rather big and unwieldy body, and if because we are an unwieldy body we will assign the duties we have under the Constitution, then the people ought to devise some other means of being represented.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose this amendment should be adopted and the Interstate Commerce Commission should fix the rate; could not Congress still unfix it?

Mr. MOON. Without doubt it could unfix it. Congress has the power over all commissions.

Mr. CANNON. Then it would be a matter of administration.

Mr. MOON. The point I am making is that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought not to be obliged in the first instance to fix a definite, affirmative rate which can not be appealed from to the courts; that Congress ought to reserve in the first instance its right, and not delegate its power to some other body, and then wait and see if that body has done what it wants done, and then act. The gentleman will readily see the difference between yielding a power carrying with it the right to consummate an act and yielding a power merely to report upon a condition.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask to be recognized, Mr. Chairman, to ask a question only.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is desired by the gentleman from Illinois for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. When this bill is enacted into law, does it not fix the rate?

Mr. MOON. Of course; the maximum rate.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the maximum rate. Now, then, after it has been tried out, on the request of the Government on the one hand and the railroads upon the other, have we not something to refer to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and does not this refer it? And when the Interstate Commerce Commission finds what the correct rate is, it becomes the rate, instead of waiting 15 years for Congress to consider it.

Mr. MOON. It becomes the rate when we say so, and that is only when it ought to become the rate.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. CANNON] always makes a very interesting contribution to the literature of the House, and he certainly made a very interesting speech a few moments ago. He is usually very illuminating in what he says, and he is generally rather accurate in making his deductions. But here I believe that he is away off his balance. To begin with, his amendment would turn over to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to fix the postal rates.

Now, we represent a hundred million people. It is true the people who own the railroads are a part of these hundred million people. It is also true that the railroads are a very important factor in the development and prosperity of the country. But it is also true that the Interstate Commerce Commission does not fix the rates on the freights carried over the railroads of the country without the right of appeal to the courts from the Interstate Commerce Commission. But if the amendment of my colleague should happen to be adopted by the House and that language became the law of the land, and the Interstate Commerce Commission were given complete jurisdiction to fix the rates on postal matter, there would be no court of appeal to which anybody could apply.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. CANNON. This bill fixes the rate when it is enacted. There is the same power, if this bill is confiscatory, to appeal to the courts that there would be to appeal to the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that this provision of the bill, without any amendment, is so fair that every Member of the House can vote for it without any qualms of conscience. We give the railroads of the country the right, immediately upon the adoption of these rates, upon the application of 51 per cent of the mileage of the roads, to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an investigation and an adjudication and a report to the Congress.

I am quite sure that there is no man upon the floor of the House now, and there will be no man in Congress whenever the report happens to be made, who will refuse to indorse the reasonable conclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but why yield up to them the power of making the final determination? We are anxious to do justice to the railroads and anxious to know that justice is done them, but why leave this important matter of the regulation of the mails of America in the hands of the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission? Why should we yield up that power? We ought not to do it. The interests of the public demand that we retain the power and that we reserve to ourselves the final right to pass upon the justice of any rate that may be recommended, not only by the Interstate Commerce Commission but by any other commission which is a creature of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, if I have time; but I thought my time had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. MOON. May we hear the amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 48, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and the first six words in line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "and fix the rates which the Postmaster General shall allow the railroads as compensation for transporting the mail."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman I move to strike out the last word. I hold in my hand a telegram from the authorities of the National Grange, which I wish to read to the House:

PEACH BOTTOM, PA., February 28, 1916.

Hon. DAVID LEWIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We are informed that a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill has been introduced limiting the parcel post to 50 pounds. Representing the repeated action of the National Grange and State granges in 33 States, we earnestly protest against any curtailment of the authority of the Post Office Department to develop this system.

JOHN A. MCSHEARRAN,
Secretary Legislative Committee National Grange.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have a rising vote.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 79.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOOD of Indiana:

"After the word 'of,' first appearing in line 15, page 48, insert the word 'any.' Strike out the letter 's' from the word 'railroads' in said line. Also strike out the following words in lines 15 and 16 of said page: 'With an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads.'"

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of showing the injustice of this bill. Under its provisions there is absolutely no chance for an appeal upon many of the questions that arise in this proposed legislation. Take some of the short railroads, for instance, concerning which it has been said that it is proposed that they shall be paid more than other roads for carrying the mail. Even among them, take two roads of the same length. It may be more expensive for one road to carry the mail than it is for another to carry the mail. All of the other roads might be satisfied with the rate fixed by the Postmaster General, and this road would be made to suffer, without any possibility for relief.

It has been said that they might refuse to carry the mail, because it is a confiscation of their property. That has been attempted once or twice in this country to my knowledge, and when it is done, what is the result? The people, with an unrighteous indignation, resent the action of the railroad, and in one instance in the United States have attempted to tear up the track. It does not matter to them whether it is confiscation or not, and they do not stop to consider that question. They want the mail carried. If this amendment obtains, it will give every railroad an opportunity to lay its particular grievances before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and every railroad should have that right, the same as every individual has his individual right to have his grievances and wrongs heard and determined by a court, irrespective of the wants or desires of any other person.

The same mistake is about to be committed here that has been committed with reference to fixing an arbitrary rate of 2 cents a mile for the carrying of passengers. The small railroads are made to suffer by that provision. There are many of the large trunk lines in several parts of this country that can well afford to carry passengers at a flat rate of 2 cents a mile, while upon the other hand there are many small roads that absolutely can not afford to do it. Yet in all the States of the Union that have adopted the 2-cent rate, no distinction is made. The same mistake is being made here.

A small railroad or a large railroad, because of the peculiar environment or the topography of the country is made to suffer. It has no relief unless it can have a majority of all the mileage of the country to join in the petition. Therefore the practical result of the bill will be that there will be no chance of appeal whatever, and it might as well not be in the bill.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. MOON. Is not there a provision in the bill that a road may make a separate contract with the Postmaster General?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is.

Mr. MOON. How many rights of appeal do you want?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As many rights of appeal as there are cases of grievance. There is a chance for an independent contract with an individual railroad, and there ought to be a like chance for that railroad, if it is not satisfied with the contract made with the Postmaster General, to appeal from his decision, and while you give the right to make an individual contract you deny the right of individual appeal.

Mr. MOON. You have no right to appeal from legislation, you have no right to appeal from the judgment of Congress on a question of legislation unless it is unconstitutional.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; but you are attempting——

Mr. MOON. We are attempting to protect the Government here; that is all.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And you ought to be as much concerned in protecting the individual himself, in protecting the individual railroad.

Mr. MOON. Surely; they are a part of the citizens of the Government.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. How are they protected under this bill?

Mr. MOON. Your little roads are now getting less than the big ones. The big companies are getting paid by weight and space, and you are not getting anything except for weight. Now, we are proposing to let them both be paid on the space basis, giving the large and the little roads—not the large roads alone, but the little roads as well—the right to go to the Postmaster General and make a separate contract to meet the conditions of that road. Now, that is enough and we ought not to go any further; but we thought that if the majority of all the roads felt that there was any error they might come to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and by that very act you will cause great injustice to be done to the small road that can not get a majority, in mileage, of the other roads to join it in presenting its grievance.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I had a similar amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and therefore am in favor of his amendment. There are some 800 independent short-line railroads in the United States.

Mr. MOON. What does the gentleman call a short-line railroad?

Mr. RAKER. I am coming to that. The provision in the bill found on page 42 applies not only to the short lines but it applies to the long lines and to all railroads that the Postmaster General may be authorized to make special contracts if in his judgment he so desires, and the railroad company wants it that way; but under this provision here you say that the short-line railroads whose trackage will not be more than 10 per cent of all the trackage in the United States, running an independent business into a rural territory for the purpose of developing that territory, that when the Postmaster General has made the special contract, or as it is provided for under the maximum rate—you make a rule different from that in any other proceeding known to American or English jurisprudence; you say to the weak that are trying to succeed, that have a just case, that want to give independent service to the public at a fair compensation, that before they can have a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission they must go with a suppliant knee, crawling on the carpet, to the large railroad companies, sacrificing their independence, yielding some of their rights in the way of transportation, before they can have a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOON. I do not know what you call a short line. The bill does not provide anything in the way of a short line or a long line; it provides for all railroad lines. The bill provides for an agreement with the department if you are not satisfied with the present rates. Then it provides an appeal by 51 per cent of the roads. Does not the gentleman think it would be an unwise thing to turn loose a thousand or two thousand railroads to make a separate case for separate contentions with the Postmaster General on a general rate?

Mr. RAKER. If there is an independent road properly organized and existing that has a just cause for complaint that it is not properly treated, and in every other court of justice the weak and the poor, and in this instance the short-line railroad, should have the opportunity to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission to the end that it may present to that commission upon the facts and the record of that railroad their case, and not upon that of 51 per cent of all the railroads in the United States before it can get an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman think that is right in fixing a general rate? How on earth could it happen that the Interstate Commerce Commission could fix a separate rate for all railroads. It is to fix a general rate. It is impossible to do the thing that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. RAKER. The commission is not fixing the rate; it is making a report to Congress as to what ought to be the rate, and clearly, if it fixes a rate for the transcontinental railroad, but at the same time confiscatory to the short-line railroad, unquestionably the courts would not approve such a rate as would confiscate the property of a small road and give a large road full compensation.

Mr. MOON. But the gentleman is demanding a separate hearing.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOON. For 2,000 railroads. They would come to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and there would be 2,000 decisions to be made before they could reach a general average and fix a rate, and then come to Congress. The gentleman sees the impracticability of the proposition. That whole question is covered in the first instance by giving the short-line railroad the right of contract with the Postmaster General, and then if there is any error at all that involves a general average of the whole roads, 51 per cent of them can have it corrected. Otherwise you would have the Interstate Commerce Commission contending with 2,000 rate cases, and you would never get an end to it.

Mr. RAKER. So far as the provision in regard to authorizing a special contract is concerned, the Postmaster General may make a contract as to one road. You give him that power, and it is fair. That being the case, the railroad that has had a special contract provided for under the bill is denied the right, under the Interstate Commerce Commission, for relief until it has exhausted its money and resources in going over the United States securing the consent of 51 per cent of the mileage of all the railroads of the United States before it can go before the tribunal with a chance of presenting its case.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman's contention and the contention of others here amounts to this: They are apprehensive that the railroads in peculiar and particular conditions will not receive fair treatment at the hands of the Post Office Department.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no; I do not make that contention.

Mr. FINLEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this. Under existing law the Postmaster General may exempt any railroad he sees proper from carrying the mails to and from the post office when the post office is within the 80-rod limit. To my certain knowledge I know instances where the Postmaster General has relieved railroads of that duty, and that burden and expense. So I think the gentleman will have no trouble with his short-line railroads, and I know there are railroads in the far West—I mentioned one this morning——

Mr. RAKER. Yes; the McLeod River Railroad Co. for one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be now closed upon this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate be now closed upon the paragraph.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the House for three or four minutes upon this amendment.

Mr. MOON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment close in three minutes, the gentleman from Colorado to have that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that all debate on this amendment close in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that under the provisions of this bill the large railroads are being given an undue advantage over the little short-line roads. I am not at all concerned about the large railroads; they can take care of themselves; but in the State that I have the honor in part to represent we have quite a number of short-line roads, from 10 to 50 miles long, running from the main lines up to mining camps or various other places. Those short-line railroads have to operate under very great expense. They ought not to be put upon the same footing with the transcontinental long lines, but they are tied together in this bill in such manner that it takes 51 per cent of all of the railroads before they can get an appeal. It does seem to me that the short-line railroads ought to be given a right to appeal by themselves. Otherwise I fear the long main lines can crush them out of existence. I am afraid this bill will give the long lines a power to practically confiscate the little railroads. I may be mistaken, but I think not. I believe the short lines ought not to be yoked up with the long ones, but that they should be given an opportunity so that in case their rights are injured they may have a separate appeal of their own without compelling them to beseech the big ones who may be interested in crushing and wiping them out.

Mr. MOON. They have all the advantage under this bill, in my judgment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. How?

Mr. MOON. First, the short lines are now paid only for weight. The long lines are paid for space and weight. We are now providing that the short lines shall be paid for space and weight, and then, if the lines are very short, they may make frequent trips.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But these roads that I refer to make only one trip a day. They can not make frequent trips in my State.

Mr. MOON. Then, with the terminal, initial, and pouch charges, and the general rate, which is better than the long lines, they will find themselves in better shape than ever before. Of course there may be a few cases where that will not be true.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no authority to speak for the short-line roads, and I am not well informed about this matter; but why should not the short-line railroads be given a separate right of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. MOON. What do you call short-line railroads?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. You can definitely fix that in this bill. Any length—say 50 or 75 miles.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman will have 780 of these roads, small ones, appealing, as short-line railroads, for 780 different rates.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not mean each separate road to have an appeal, but a reasonable number of them similarly situated. Why should they be compelled to seek relief only by permission of the big roads?

Mr. MOON. Yes; different rates; they are bound to be by the gentleman's very contention.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why not make it 51 or 20 per cent of the short lines may have an appeal?

Mr. MOON. You could not make it 51 per cent of the short lines, because there is no way of determining what a short line is.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then make an arbitrary rule as to the length of a line that shall be considered a short line.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman talks about tying themselves up with big roads. You have done your own tying, and your little roads are trying to get away from them, and the gentleman seems to be actually standing against this bill, which is in their interest.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not done any tying, and if the short lines have it is because the big roads compelled them to. It looks to me that this bill may practically turn the little roads over to the big ones.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 45, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 48, line 22, after the word "much," strike out the period and insert a comma, and insert also the following words: "make specific findings as to whether the compensation should be computed upon the space or the weight basis."

Mr. MOON. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], in discussing the previous amendment, stated that if a majority of the railroads, or railroads representing 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads, carrying the mail were dissatisfied with the rates paid them that they ought to be given the privilege of appealing to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, the purpose of this amendment is to give railroads representing 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying the mail, if they are dissatisfied with the method under which they are paid, a similar right of appeal and hearing. There is grave doubt, I submit, in spite of the representations of the Post Office Committee, as to whether this change in the method of compensation is going to work out satisfactorily to all concerned; and I submit that if that doubt exists it is only fair that an impartial and disinterested tribunal should be given authority, upon proper appeal from a sufficient number of roads, to investigate this question and make a specific finding as to whether this change from weight to space basis is warranted and as to whether paying them upon the space basis will be fair and work out justice to the railroads and promote the efficiency of service. That is the purpose I have in offering this amendment, and I trust that the chairman of the committee will not make the point of order against it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the amendment is subject to the point of order or not; the Chair can rule on that; but I will not object to a vote. This question has been discussed twenty times or more, and I believe I do not want to take up any more time on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 16, strike out the word "fifty-one" and insert the word "twenty-five."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this, I understand, is what the commission really recommended as a sufficient number of railroads to consent to take the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask the chairman if that is not correct?

Mr. MOON. No; we did not recommend that; we recommended 51 per cent.

Mr. RAKER. I understood it was 25 per cent the commission recommended. I do not think you ought to require these short-line railroads in the West, who have been struggling to build up the country, and who have spent all their money and time, to go east to procure the consent of these other railroads that they might go into court or before the Interstate Commerce Commission and get a fair hearing.

Mr. MOON. Well, the gentleman assumes they are not going to be treated fairly.

Mr. RAKER. No; I do not.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman's proposition is bound to assume that.

Mr. RAKER. If you would assume that, you would assume that every man in the world would do right, and there would be no need of courts; but, unfortunately, men differ, and both may be right, having an honest difference; and the man who operates the service thinks he is not paid enough and the man who is getting the service thinks he is paying too much, and the only remedy is some tribunal for the purpose of settling it.

Mr. MOON. Here are a number of people engaged in the same business. A right is given to them to get away from a statutory contract upon an appeal of 51 per cent of them—a majority. Ought it to be less?

Mr. RAKER. I know, as a sample, from Bartlett to Sisson, Cal., that for two years and a half, or very nearly three years, that railroad has been carrying the mail for nothing. In other words, it has not had one cent of compensation. I went to the railroad people asking them if they would not continue it, after having had a petition from every individual in the community to the effect that if the railroad did not carry the mail or handle the service those people in that country would be deprived of the service and the star route would possibly have to be established, and cost the Government four times as much, because the railroad company was not being paid for services upon the short-line railroad. That is only one instance, but there are a number of instances, and I can not understand why Congress should not provide for the short-line railroads that have been trying to upbuild the country and give service, and then compel them to go to the long lines, the great railroad companies, and yield to them before they have an opportunity to appeal to a court of justice for a fair hearing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why did not the gentleman from California make his amendment apply to the short-line roads and let the long-line roads remain as they are?

Mr. RAKER. I do not know anything about the long-line roads. They will take care of themselves, but I do believe that as to these short-line roads that have been built into these mountain valleys for the purpose of building them up, that are independent and trying to give service, this Congress or any other Congress should not so legislate as to prevent them from having just compensation to the end that they get fair return for the services rendered. I do not want to pay anybody anything who has not rendered service.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. MOON. Now, the law does not provide or determine in any way what a long-line road or a short-line road is, and your amendment does not reach that question. And let me submit this question: Suppose one of your roads is 12 miles long; in relation to that road every other road in the United States is a longer one.

Mr. RAKER. Comparatively speaking.

Mr. MOON. Of course. And that is what we are dealing with—comparative matters. There is no way of determining what a short line or a long line will be, and the only way the thing could be determined, by one decision, by one legislative enactment, instead of six or seven, is to let the majority of the roads determine the question by appealing to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. RAKER. That means you will have to go to every man in the community, the same as a man if he had a right to a suit would have to ask whether or not he should have an opportunity to be heard in court; just like in the railroad proposition, if a man has not been treated fairly and the compensation is not sufficient, he has to get the consent of 51 per cent of the railroads over the country for the purpose of securing relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 12, page 48, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 48, line 12, strike out the word "act" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. This section went out of the bill on a point of order. It comes back into the bill——

Mr. MANN. We have not finished reading the section.

Mr. FESS (continuing). Through a rule. Is it in the bill without an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Section 17 is not in the bill now. The question at the conclusion of the next paragraph will be on the adoption of section 17 as proposed by the rule.

Mr. FESS. Is that in the form of an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. We have been treating these various sections as amendments proposed by the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the ruling of the Chair modify the rule made a little while ago when I inquired whether a motion to strike out on another section——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair erred as to the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That motion would not be entertained now?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion would not be entertained now.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, are hereby made available for the purposes of this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for section 17.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment to the paragraph first?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. I will withhold for the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend, Mr. Chairman, in line 12, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 49, line 12, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute for section 17 proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. RAKER: Strike out section 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust annually the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes from and after the 1st day of January, 1917, upon the conditions and at the rates provided by law, the average daily weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual simultaneous weighing of the mails for 30 successive working days, commencing on such date as the Postmaster General may designate each year: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may request railroad companies to have their regular station employees, where practicable and desirable, to take and report the weights upon forms provided and under such regulations and supervision by postmasters as may be directed by him."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the ruling of the Chair, that a motion to strike out the entire section is not in order, pertain as to this motion to strike out and offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is not to strike out, as the Chair understands. The gentleman from California offers a substitute for the amendment proposed by the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May we have the Clerk read the introduction of the motion by the gentleman from California?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the motion of the gentleman from California.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order on that matter. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the Chair's attention to the opening sentence of the motion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the motion submitted by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move to strike out section 17 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the motion of the gentleman from California is to offer a substitute for the section.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules, I would like to call the Chair's attention to the words of the resolution. It does not propose all this language as an amendment to the bill. The words of the rule as adopted by the House were these, that—

In such further consideration—

That is, of the bill H. R. 10484—

it shall be in order (the general rules of the House notwithstanding) to consider the following items in said bill.

It is not to consider them as an amendment, Mr. Chairman, but to consider them as being in the bill and before the House for consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my request be considered as a substitute instead of a motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks permission to modify his request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from California to section 17, as proposed by the rule.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, before taking the vote I desire——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate is closed on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not recall the form of the motion that the gentleman made on the preceding paragraph. The section had not been read at that time. It was the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests, the section had not been read, and the proposition to the committee, as submitted by the Chair, was that the debate on the paragraph close in five minutes. That was the proposition adopted by the committee. Now the gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this substitute close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moves that all debate on this substitute for section 17 be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that motion can not be made until a speech has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no debate on it yet. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, apropos of this proposed amendment, I wish to say that there are a great number of the railroads, short lines, doing business in northern California, to which this would apply—as, of course, this would apply generally—that is, to have an annual weighing of the mails. The road would then get paid for approximately the amount of mail that it hauls in a year, while under the terms of this bill you pay it, not according to the service it renders, but according to every other service rendered at every place and everywhere else. Practically all that these people want is an opportunity to get fair and full compensation for the service rendered. I yield back the remaining part of my time. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute for section 17 proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the substitute was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute to offer.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOON. There is some uncertainty here as to whether the Clerk has read the last five lines or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read the last five lines.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment as a substitute to section 17, namely, the adoption of section 17 as it now stands in the bill with this clause stricken out:

Provided, That no parcel-post package shall exceed 50 pounds in weight.

That is section 17 as it now stands, with the Madden amendment omitted. I would like to address the Chair for a reasonable length of time on this subject.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that that is not a substitute. The paragraph has been passed, and the gentleman is simply trying by another method to move to strike out something that has already been inserted as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LEWIS. This is a substitute for the section, and it is different from the section as it stands, because it omits the Madden amendment providing for a limit of 50 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order to offer a substitute which simply strikes out an amendment that has already been agreed to by the committee. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The question is on the adoption of section 17 as proposed by the rule and as amended in the committee.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 138, noes 27.

Accordingly section 17 as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments which have been agreed to, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAINEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ask for a separate vote on the Madden amendment as passed last Saturday.

Mr. MANN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to know if there are any difficulties in the way of getting a separate vote before the motion for the previous question is put.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there are.

Mr. MOON. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry after the Chair puts the question. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question is voted down, will it not then be in order to make a motion to agree to the amendment providing for changing the system for paying the railroads with an amendment striking out the language that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] desires to have stricken out.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is voted down, amendments are in order to the amendments reported by the committee, provided they are within the degree provided by the rules as to germaneness.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROUSE. Are the amendments reported under the special rule a part of the bill, or are they amendments to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to be heard? If not, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to have any special technical knowledge on this question. I merely wish to make the Speaker of the House understand that unless the Madden amendment possesses the character of an amendment at this juncture of the proceedings of this body then a separate vote can not be demanded, and a blow at the parcel post, practically delivered without notice, without committee consideration, almost in the dark so far as the protection of its life is concerned, has been delivered.

Now, upon the technical merits of the question what situation do we have? The Post Office appropriation bill is reported. About half of the sections in that report were objected to because containing new legislation on an appropriation bill. The rule then is asked from the Rules Committee, and the Rules Committee makes that part of the structure of the bill in order by special rule. The sections of the bill relating to the railway pay were a part of the vertebræ of the original bill as reported. There were 17 sections, and the resolution reported from the Rules Committee provides that "the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and in such further consideration it shall be in order (the general rules of the House notwithstanding) to consider the following items in said bill." Then it goes on and mentions sections 7, 8, 9, 11, and 17, being the sections as to which the point of order was raised.

These sections put before the House are a part of the structure of the original bill, and to call them amendments merely because it was necessary that the Rules Committee give authorization for their consideration here is a misuse of words. In their very conception, birth, and delivery they were a part of the original bill and so reported by the committee.

Now, here is an amendment to section 17, offered on Saturday, that I believe obviously did not receive consideration in this House, for there is hardly a column in the RECORD devoted to it, and only one man addressed the House on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I think I am not exaggerating when I say that the House this evening would like to have a separate vote on the Madden amendment. It was an amendment which originated in this body. It came from one man; it had none of the characteristics of a structural bill. A bill coming from the committee represents collective action, and this represented nothing but an individual motion on this floor. It answers the description and the idea of an amendment. When you read the bill as reported by the committee, when you read the bill as considered by the Rules Committee, you find no difference. To read the sections from 7 to 17 as amendments can only have an effect of preventing the House from exercising its constitutional right of having a separate vote on real amendments.

Where do amendments arise? In this House. The sections of the bill arise in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and not in the House. It seems to me only a perversion of words—of the functional purposes of words—to say that the Madden amendment is not an amendment, and that the vertebræ of the bill in its original state are amendments.

Now, the rule has an object, and in construing it we ought to bear that object in mind. It has reserved for this House, as a House of Representatives and as a whole, some control over the amendments which may happen without proper preliminary consideration in mere Committee of the Whole with, it may be 100, and it may be only 40 or 50, and even less present. An interpretation such as that suggested would kill the very purpose and right of a separate vote on amendments.

I do not know that I can add more, but I do know that this House wants to vote on the subject this afternoon, and the rules ought, it seems to me, to be construed in a way to effect the original purpose of giving the House the right to a separate vote on an amendment originating in the House.

The SPEAKER. While it is not exactly regular in the practice of the House to decide a great parliamentary question raised by a parliamentary inquiry, still the Chair will do it at this time. The Chair wants to preface it with a statement that personally he would vote for the position taken by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] if he ever got a chance, but what the gentleman from Maryland thinks about it or what the Chair thinks about it is neither here nor there. The House has its own remedy; it can do anything it pleases with the bill if the previous question is voted down. But the Chair is in duty bound to decide according to the rules and practices of the House.

Here is the situation. On Friday of last week the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had completed the discussion of the Post Office appropriation bill, and it would have been perfectly competent for the chairman of the committee, or any other gentleman, to have moved that the committee then rise and report its proceedings to the House and wind it up. It turned out, however, that certain propositions had gone out of the bill on points of order. Then, when the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads might have intervened with a motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, the Committee on Rules brought in a rule, and that is how the House has come to be discussing the bill further. The language in the rule that is pertinent to this inquiry is—and in such further consideration it shall be in order (the general rules of the House notwithstanding) to consider the following items in said bill.

As a matter of fact, those items were not in that bill when the Committee on Rules reported the rule. They had gone out on points of order. More than that, the language of the rule might possibly have been shaped in such a way as to have restored these things to the bill, but it did not do so.

In addition to that, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], has treated these various propositions that the rule has forced in as amendments. Further, the Committee of the Whole House itself has considered them in that way and there is a pretty large attendance here this evening. Taking all of these things together, the Chair holds that these propositions that were made germane to this bill by the rule are to be considered as amendments and not as part of the original bill. The Chair so considers them.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the House, by the simple action of voting down the previous question, if the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads will not withdraw his motion for the previous question, can adopt an amendment striking out the so-called Madden amendment.

The SPEAKER. It would open up the whole bill for amendment if the previous question be voted down.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that, but the Chair likes to give everyone a fair deal. [Applause.] The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOON) there were—ayes 141, noes 73.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-seven Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Speaker has just counted the House and determined how many are present. The rule demands that one-fifth of those present shall second the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers, if that point be held good.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Madden amendment, so called.

Mr. MANN. There is no such amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to demand a vote on that whole amendment, if he desires a separate vote upon it. The House does not take cognizance of an amendment to an amendment in the Committee of the Whole. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on section 17.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a separate vote on section 17. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Does the Speaker hold that no part of section 17 can be considered as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will have to be considered as a whole.

Mr. LONDON. In other words, that the entire section is one amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is the way the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled and the way the committee itself ruled by submitting to that ruling all the way through, and both are right. The Chair rules the same way.

Mr. LONDON. And there is no possible parliamentary way of dealing with the Madden amendment as a separate amendment?

The SPEAKER. Not since the previous question has been ordered. The gentleman might move to refer the whole bill back to the committee if he wants to do so.

Mr. MANN. That would depend upon whether he got recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report section 17.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question first is upon agreeing to the other amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asks unanimous consent that the reading of amendment 17 be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of section 17 be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentlemen if they are willing to agree to a separate vote on this amendment, otherwise I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is "Is there objection?"

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

The Clerk again began the reading of the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The question is on section 17, so called, as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 141, noes 37.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I doubt the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference about doubting it if the gentleman does not make the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-eight gentlemen are present, a quorum. [Applause.]

So section 17 as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with instructions to report it back to the House forthwith, striking out lines 19, 20, 21, and the first six words of line 22, on page 48, section 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "and fix the rate which the Postmaster General shall allow the railroads as compensation for transporting the mail," and upon that motion I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I am, and I expect to vote against it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order. The Speaker has ruled, I think, upon this matter a number of times. Section 17 was an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the House. The House has just agreed to section 17. The Speaker, as I recall, commencing with the Philippine bill and repeated several times since, has ruled that where the House has agreed to an amendment it is not in order to move to recommit and to change that amendment where the House had acted upon it.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair listens to the gentleman from Illinois the Chair wants to know what the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] wants.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I mean to vote against the bill unless this motion I offered is adopted, and I want to inquire whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] means to vote against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois said he did.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the rule and the point of order that the gentleman, my colleague, Mr. MANN, makes; and as to the point of order that the gentleman, my colleague, makes, as I recollect the rule, after the previous question is ordered and the bill is read the third time, it is in order for some Member who is opposed to the bill to move to recommit it to the committee, in this case the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions.

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that, provided the instructions are in order.

Mr. CANNON. Provided they are in order. I do not recollect to have heard this point passed upon. I have no recollection, either from precedents, or my own experience as a Member of the House, or as Speaker, of such a question having arisen. And yet there is the letter of the rule, and the spirit of the rule, it seems to me, would give the House the privilege of entertaining and passing upon this motion.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maryland rise?

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Wait until we get through with this.

Mr. LEWIS. It involves the same parliamentary point, and I would like to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair will rule that out when he comes to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. The Speaker did not understand. I mean to suggest that it involves the same parliamentary point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and before that point is disposed of I would like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The trouble about that situation is, that the gentleman from Illinois offered a motion to recommit with instructions, and immediately moved the previous question. Now, if his motion to recommit turns out to be in order, and then the motion for the previous question is put, it cuts off everything else. If the gentleman from Maryland wants to be heard on the point of order, and it is the same one that has arisen in his case that arises in the case of the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. LEWIS. It relates, sir, to the propriety of a motion to recommit, striking out certain provisions of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is identically the same point that arises in the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, without expressing an opinion upon the merits of what the gentlemen are trying to get considered, I have an opinion on the parliamentary question, and I think that question is so important that it transcends what lies back of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not seem to me that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recommit with instructions is undertaking to immediately undo what the House has already done, and therefore subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has stated the whole question.

Mr. SHERLEY. The proposition, it seems to me, is this, if I understand the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]: It is not simply to strike out something which the House has just adopted. That manifestly would not be in order under the guise of a motion to recommit, but it is to strike out and substitute a new proposal, which presents a different question and is within the rule of a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist that this motion is within the rule?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is, because it is not undertaking simply to undo something which the House has done. The House has agreed to an amendment, but the proposal which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes is more than simply striking it out. If he had stopped there, then the point of order would lie, because it might be well said that you are asking the House to simply undo what it has just done, and therefore that it was not in order. He does not do that. He asks that an alternative proposition be substituted upon which the House has not heretofore expressed an opinion.

Mr. MOON. My understanding is that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is one to strike out the matter that the House refuses to strike out and insert the language the House refused to insert.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was in the committee and has nothing to do with the situation here. The proposition is this: In the House we voted simply upon an affirmative amendment. If the motion of the gentleman from Illinois was to recommit the bill and report it back striking out that amendment, manifestly his motion would be out of order, because he would be undertaking to undo what has just been acted upon by the House. But it does not stop there.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman speaking of his impression of what the parliamentary law ought to be or his recollection of the precedent?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have in mind the precedents as shown in the digest, but I have not seen the full text. But the digest does not contain anything, as I read it, that is contrary to the position I have now taken.

Mr. MANN. I am afraid the gentleman has not just read it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have just read it, but I read it hurriedly, necessarily, in the confusion of the Chamber. It will not be the first time I have been wrong, if I am wrong now.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Kentucky finished?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am yielding to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. On the Philippine bill the question first came up. Here is a statement of the facts:

> After some discussion one way and another the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested to the gentleman from Colorado that there was a way for him to accomplish what he was after, provided the Chair ruled his substitute out of order, and that was to strike out.

This was a motion to recommit, with an amendment. I read further:

> That was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the original bill, leaving out the Olmsted amendment, which had been adopted on the 8th of May.

In order to keep the RECORD correct, I will say that the motion was to strike out all after the word "that," so that it was a motion to strike out and substitute—exactly what this is.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no. The gentleman fails to catch the point of his own reasoning. Here is what happened: The committee put in and the House had agreed to what was called the Olmsted amendment. Now, the gentleman desired to agree to everything in the bill except the Olmsted amendment, and it was held that the House having just expressed its opinion on the amendment, such a motion to recommit was not in order.

That is not the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. He does not desire to report the bill back simply with this section stricken out, but he desires to report the bill with the section stricken out and something else put in.

Mr. MANN. That is what this was, to strike out the section and insert something else.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman is specious. He is not getting at the fact.

Mr. MANN. What is the fact? I made the same argument then that the gentleman is making now and was overruled by the Chair.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Was it not held that the only change in the bill was the elimination of this amendment, and there was no new matter?

Mr. SHERLEY. There was no new matter inserted.

Mr. MANN. The Chair does not determine those things. It is an easy matter always to change a word; and if this motion is in order, then it would be in order to change a word and strike out all after the first word and insert the balance of the section. That is putting something in and taking something out.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would not be an unusual thing. We have frequently had it held that an amendment was in order that was in substance like one which had just been voted on.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; and therefore the rule is that it is not in order to strike out what the House has just agreed to, no matter what you propose to insert. You can propose to insert something additional. That would be in order. But it is not in order under this rule to move to strike out. That is the crux of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The proposition here is whether it is in order to strike out something and substitute something else instead.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, in every case where it has been ruled upon, in every case where the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] obtains, the identical proposition in the motion to recommit had been voted upon by the House.

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition contained in the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has never been voted upon by this House. If the previous question had been voted down, no one would contend that that amendment would not have been in order. In the Philippine case and in these other cases the Chair placed the ruling squarely upon the proposition that the House has voted directly upon that single proposition. That is not true, Mr. Speaker, in this case; and let me suggest this to the Speaker: Supposing a bill containing one section, and it is a substitute in the form of an amendment. The amendment takes the usual course, and, if the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is correct, of what value would be the motion to recommit upon that amendment in the form of a substitute? There would be no possibility of offering a motion to recommit or proposing to change in any degree that substitute. And I want the Speaker to bear in mind that this is not a motion to strike out what the House has just adopted, but it is a motion, in the case of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], to strike out and insert, and that proposition the House has never had an opportunity to vote upon. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, if in order——

The SPEAKER. Not yet. Jefferson's Manual, section 466 of the Manual, reads as follows:

> But if it had been carried affirmatively to strike out the words and to insert A, it could not afterwards be permitted to strike out A and insert B. The mover of B should have notified, while the insertion of A was under debate, that he would move to insert B; in which case those who preferred it would join in rejecting A.

On the 22d day of May, 1912, in that Philippine case to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] refers, the circumstances were these: That just about this time in the evening on Calendar Wednesday the point of order was raised, and it went over until the next Wednesday, so that the Chair, who happened to be myself, had ample time to study it and render an opinion—and it is rather an elaborate opinion—in which the Chair held that this thing which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is trying to do could not be done. To buttress my own opinion I quoted at length from an opinion rendered by Mr. Speaker Carlisle. I said:

> The most elaborate opinion that was ever rendered on the question whether the House can do indirectly on a motion to recommit what it can not do directly by amendment was rendered by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, which I will read in a minute in lieu of all the rest.

And there is a long string of decisions that might have been cited.

> But on one occasion Mr. Speaker Blaine refused to pass upon a question of the sort and submitted it to the House, and by a vote of about two-thirds the House took the same position that these other Speakers, beginning wih Mr. Speaker Taylor, had taken, and on at least two occasions an appeal was taken from the ruling of the Chair, and the House on both occasions sustained the decision of the Chair by a vote of about two to one.

The decisions run clear back to Mr. Speaker Taylor, of New York.

> On July 27, 1886—

This is in Fifth Hinds, section 5533—

> the previous question had been demanded on the passage of a bill restoring to the United States certain lands granted to railroads, when Mr. Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois, moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report the Senate bill, for which this substitute had been adopted that had just been voted out.
> Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, made a point of order that the Senate bill was the text that the House had stricken out, and that it was not in order to direct the committee to report that which the House had just rejected.

Of course, that was turning the question around.

> The Speaker sustained the point of order—

That is, Speaker Carlisle—

> and held that it was not in order to move the recommitment of a bill with instructions to report matters which would not be in order if offered as an amendment in the House.
> Nobody will contend, if some gentleman had arisen in his place and made a motion to strike out this Olmsted amendment which was inserted on the 8th day of May, that the Chair would have entertained the motion.

Then Mr. Speaker Carlisle continued:

> The House had just voted to strike out the text of Senate bill and insert a new proposition, and it was not therefore in order to do indirectly, by way of recommitment, that which could not be done directly by way of amendment.
> So, on that point, the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Olmsted].

And the Chair now sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit, which I think avoids the objections urged.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. LEWIS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman from Maryland opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. He said he was.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. I can say that very sincerely, as long as this provision is in the bill.

Mr. MANN. I noticed that the gentleman had voted very consistently for the bill at every stage.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman from Maryland will vote against it, and is opposed to the bill as it stands.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the gentleman's motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. LEWIS moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with instructions to report it back forthwith with an amendment adding the words "one hundred and" before the word "fifty," in line 15, as amended on page 38.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it again.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The point of order raised by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is overruled.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands the previous question and the gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not care to discuss it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman desire to discuss the point of order? [After a pause.] The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Maryland moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEWIS) there were—92 ayes and 166 noes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Fifty-four Members have arisen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is this roll call on the previous question or on the recommitment of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The call is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland to recommit the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 178, answered "present" 3, not voting 113, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 29, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 25, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hughes	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Husting	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	James	Overman	Sterling

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably detained on official business.

Mr. STONE. I wish to announce the absence on account of illness of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. This announcement may stand for to-day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] are detained from the Senate at a hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call; there is a quorum present.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a request for a unanimous-consent agreement, and I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee presents the following unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 5 o'clock on Wednesday, March 1, 1916, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3331, the unfinished business now before the Senate, and during that legislative day shall vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock on the 2d day of March, 1916, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask for the adoption of that agreement by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary for the Chair to order a roll call of the Senate unless there shall be an objection, in which event there will be no necessity to call the roll.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was otherwise engaged, and I did not hear the request read. I should like to hear it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read the proposed agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I object. I may say to the Senator from Tennessee that there are two vital amendments to the bill that are yet to be debated, and until they have been debated I will not give my consent to fixing an hour for a vote or for limiting discussion to the time mentioned in the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be an objection, and it is not needful to call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. If there is objection, I do not desire to consume the time by having the roll called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this bill has now been before the Senate for more than two weeks, and the committee having charge of it desire to expedite it in every way possible. We had hoped to get an hour fixed as stated in the proposed agreement to vote on it not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow, but there is objection. The committee will ask at the proper time for a recess and a night session and it will pursue every possible way to bring this debate to an end.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a pending amendment which might be disposed of. The Chair can not dispose of it. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. SHIELDS. That amendment was passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any way for the Chair to pass amendments over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let it be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 13, after the word "Provided" and before the colon, insert the following:

The words "navigable waters" for the purposes of this act shall be construed to mean such streams and parts of streams which are in fact navigable and used for the transportation of merchandise in commerce and also such streams and parts of streams as may be designated by the Secretary of War as capable of improvement for the purposes of navigation and transportation of merchandise in commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment must be either disposed of or withdrawn.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to ask unanimous consent yesterday to have it passed over, and it was done. I have not examined the RECORD, but that was my understanding at the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the RECORD:

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I am very willing to yield to the request of the Senator from Iowa and have the amendment passed over for the present. So it may go over.

The amendment was not, by unanimous consent, postponed.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the Senator from Maine, I had hoped that this particular subject might be passed over or, at least, not voted upon until we had an opportunity to confer with the Senator from Tennessee, in the hope that there might be reached an agreement that would be satisfactory to everyone interested in the bill. That is all I can say about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order that the clerks may keep the record straight, and in order that the Chair may know what is really before the Senate, there is no reason why the Senator from Maine should not temporarily withdraw his amendment and present it hereafter, when it is desirable to do so; but the Secretary can not keep two pending amendments before the Senate at the same time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa correctly stated the position. I am not willing that the amendment shall be temporarily laid aside unless I may be able to offer it later. I think it would make the record clear if I now ask that the amendment lie on the table, and I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the amendment will lie on the table and be called up whenever the Senator from Maine desires to call it up. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there was a similar situation with reference to the amendment offered by myself yesterday morning. The disposition of it appears on page 3709 of the RECORD. The Senator from Tennessee said:

The amendment has not been printed, having been just offered. The Senator says it is the most vital amendment that has been presented to the bill. I therefore ask that it go over and be printed, to be considered after we have had an opportunity to examine it.

I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is his desire to take up that amendment now?

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator from Montana to allow the amendment to take the same course the amendment of the Senator from Maine did. I have not had time to examine it.

Mr. WALSH. I should be very glad to pursue that course, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment was offered for printing. It has not been formally offered as an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Montana yield for a question before going on to another matter?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator from Montana if the amendment proposed by him yesterday, on page 10, following the word "granted," in line 23, was printed as an amendment or simply printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can answer that. It is on the desk printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. WALSH. I offer an amendment, as follows: After the word "aggrieved," in line 11, page 11, insert the words "or upon its own initiative."

Mr. SHIELDS. I offer no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 11, after the word "aggrieved," insert the words "or upon its own initiative."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have an amendment to offer touching the clause found on page 13. After a conference with the Senator from Tennessee it was thought that there might be some language inserted which would be mutually agreeable.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator and I have agreed upon an amendment that will make it acceptable, which I desire to offer.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; I withhold my amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move to amend, on page 13, line 15, by striking out after the word "after," in that line, "such conviction has been affirmed on appeal or the right of appeal has expired," and inserting in lieu the words "final judgment in either civil or criminal proceedings provided for."

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment. I could not hear the Senator from Tennessee state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out the words "such conviction has been affirmed on appeal or the right of appeal has expired" and to insert "final judgment in either civil or criminal proceedings provided for."

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the attention of the Senator from Tennessee? I had prepared an amendment, which I expected to offer, which proposes to strike out the very language that the Senator has proposed to strike out. I have not heard all of the amendment which the Senator has offered, except as the Secretary has read it, and I wish the Senator would explain it. If it accomplishes what I sought to accomplish in my amendment, of course I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will explain the amendment to the Senator. The bill in section 8 provides, first, for a criminal proceeding for the violation of the terms of the permit and the provisions of this proposed statute. Then it provides for a proceeding in equity to inhibit and enjoin such violations. The provision as proposed to be amended is in these words:

And if the unlawful maintenance and operation continues after such conviction has been affirmed on appeal or the right of appeal has expired and is deemed by the court to be such as shall require, in the public interest, a decree revoking all rights and privileges held under authority of the act, the court may decree such revocation—

And further proceedings in that line.

The infirmity of the bill as it stood was that it did not provide for the termination of the civil proceedings. The object of this amendment is to give the defendant the benefit of a hearing in a court before a forfeiture is declared or before he is required, except under an injunction, to desist from any course of conduct. It simply gives him the right to a final determination by a court of last resort before any change of his claim or right.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator to read the language which he proposes to insert, and also the language as it would read if his amendment were adopted.

Mr. SHIELDS. Beginning after the semicolon in line 14, page 13, which follows the provision for the two remedies in a criminal proceeding and in an equity proceeding, as amended the bill would read:

And if the unlawful maintenance and operation continues after final judgment in either the civil or criminal proceedings provided—

Then go down to line 17, where it reads:

And is deemed by the court to be such as shall require—

And so forth.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will pardon me for a suggestion, I desire to say that I think the words "of this section" should be added to the language proposed by the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think that would clarify it somewhat, and I will add to the amendment the words "provided in this section."

The VICE PRESIDENT. As now modified, the amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, in line 15, it is proposed to strike out the words "such conviction has been affirmed on appeal or the right of appeal has expired" and insert "final judgment in either civil or criminal proceedings provided for in this section," so that it will read:

And if the unlawful maintenance and operation continues after final judgment in either civil or criminal proceedings provided for in this section, and is deemed by the court to be such as shall require—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I have made some notations in regard to this particular part of the bill, which I do not now have before me; neither have I the amendment which I have prepared on the subject. I am not sure but that the amendment was introduced and printed, perhaps at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] or perhaps of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]; but as I understand the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] it would not have a tendency to expedite the proceedings any more than the language now in the bill, would it?

Mr. SHIELDS. The object of the amendment is to include the final judgment in the civil proceeding as well as in a criminal proceeding. That is all there is to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh!

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill as written failed to take into consideration the civil proceeding, and this amendment includes it.

Mr. NORRIS. To my way of thinking, the language was objectionable, and as I now look at it, without having had time to read the entire section, the language proposed would be equally objectionable, although I have no objection to striking this language out and putting the other in. So I shall not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I offer an amendment, in line 24, page 13, after the word "act," to insert:

And all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, or such part thereof as the court may direct.

In explanation of this amendment, Mr. President, I desire to say that the bill provides that in case of a forfeiture or revocation of the permit, the court may decree the sale of the dam or diversion structure and all appurtenant property constructed or acquired under authority of this act.

Really, Mr. President, it can scarcely be said that any property is acquired by virtue of the act, and nothing more than the dam and the diversion structures would be constructed by virtue of the act. All other structures would be erected without regard to the act; but it would seem to be quite unfair to the permittee for the court to sell only the dam and diversion works and leave all the other property on his hands, the value of it being entirely dependent upon the property which has already been sold. It seems to me that when the court takes away from him the dam and the diversion works, it ought not to leave on his hands the balance of it, but that it ought to take also all other property the value of which is dependent upon the permit that is granted to him.

Furthermore, Mr. President, of course it will be necessary to turn the works over to some one else to operate, but they would have practically only half of a plant. So I submit that this provision here ought to be in substance exactly the same as the provision concerning the property which is to be taken over at the expiration of the franchise.

I think the Senator from Tennessee will agree with me about that; that is to say, the bill provides that at the expiration of the franchise, if the right to acquire the property is exercised by the Government, not only the dam and diversion works are taken over, but all other property which is dependent on its value upon them is to be taken over.

Now, if the thing is put a period to before the expiration of the time, it seems to me the same character of property ought to be taken over; and, accordingly, I have endeavored to make the bill in this particular conform in its provision to the provisions of the bill for taking the property over at the expiration of the permit.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not think this amendment affects the provisions of the bill. The difficulty presented in formulating a section to cover this particular matter is the line where the jurisdiction of the court to make the sale on the valuation of the property in taking it over shall be fixed. The court, in making a sale, shall not have jurisdiction to force a sale of property that is only indirectly connected with the plant. An illustration can be given of a street railway operated by the power furnished by the plant or by a factory operated by the power furnished. The amendment inserts the words:

And all of the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, or such part thereof as the court may direct.

It is very difficult to draw the line of demarcation there; but the subsequent part of this section fully provides for it, I think, by giving the court the jurisdiction, "by the appointment of a receiver or otherwise," to exercise all jurisdiction necessary for the protection and administration or disposition of the property and for the equitable execution of this act." I think a court of equity would doubtless have jurisdiction to safeguard the matter, but I have no objection to the provision being made more explicit in this way. It is what the act now provides for and what it means; but I will offer no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I will suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that, perhaps, it would be still more preferable to put in here exactly the language that is found in the other provision of the bill at the bottom of page 9 and the top of page 10, designating the property that is to be taken over at the expiration of the period.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is a matter of detail that might subsequently be worked out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, line 24, after the word "act," it is proposed to insert "and all of the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted or such part thereof as the court may direct."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, would it suit the convenience of the Senator from Washington to have the amendments taken up—as I have to speak to them all—in the order in which they have been presented rather than to take up another group? In other words, I would prefer to finish the amendments which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has given notice that he intends to offer, as I have them in mind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator means to continue with the amendments offered by the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection to that, but I should like to have my amendment read and allow it to lie over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I make the suggestion for the reason I have stated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a very simple amendment, and I very much hope the Senator from Tennessee will accept it. It simply makes the power developed in these plants subject to the taxation of the States. It inserts the word "power" where the property of the grantee is made subject to taxation. The amendment inserts the words "and the power generated therein." I ask that the Secretary read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 5, after the word "purposes," it is proposed to insert the words "and the power generated therein."

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer that amendment, Mr. President, because the right of the Secretary of War to make any charges for these plants has been restricted very narrowly to the land, and I do not want to see the situation arise where these very valuable plants will escape taxation altogether, except for the actual tangible property that constitutes the plant. If it is intended that the power to be generated—and that is what gives the value to the property—shall be subject to taxation, I can not see any harm in so stating.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the provision in question reads:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any State in which such dam with its appurtenant property is located, or in which such business is to be conducted, from making and enforcing any lawful regulations, with respect to the property or business of such grantee; and the plant and its appurtenances of the grantee, including real, personal, and mixed property, constituting the same and used for the generation and distribution of power, or for other purposes, shall be subject to taxation under the laws of the State where situated as other similar property within the State.

That is all that relates to the subject. It is my opinion that that covers every possible property, tangible and intangible, the company can own, and that it further authorizes the States to levy a franchise or privilege tax against these corporations. It is intended to cover every species of property. Electricity is property, and I think it is covered; but, if the Senator thinks not and he wants it more specific, I accept the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have just one more amendment to offer, at page 14, in line 6 and line 7, to strike out the words "in case no purchaser be found"; after the word "shall," in line 7, to insert "have power"; and after the word "otherwise," in line 8, to insert "to," so that the last clause in section 8 shall read:

And the court shall have power, by the appointment of a receiver or otherwise, to exercise all jurisdiction necessary for the protection and administration or disposition of the property and for the equitable execution of this act.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if the Senator from Montana has finished now?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; except that an amendment which I have offered has gone over and lies on the table. Of course, I shall insist upon that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think he has an amendment that is substantially the same as that offered by the Senator from Montana yesterday.

Mr. NORRIS. I have several amendments, some of which I probably shall not offer, and there will be others that I expect to offer upon which I will not take up much time, because they relate to the same question. But the amendment that I was going to offer now is a new proposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. My request was not to offer the same amendment that the Senator from Montana has offered until we take that up for consideration. In other words, I have not had any more opportunity to examine the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska than I have had to examine the one offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator prefers, I will not offer my amendment now and will let some of the other Senators get through first.

Mr. SHIELDS. I only referred to the one that I thought was identical with that of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. To which one does the Senator refer?

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment concerning the valuation of the property when it is taken over by the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that the amendment I intended to offer now goes a good deal further than the proposition of the Senator from Montana. I was going to move to strike out sections 5 and 6. I have put it all in one amendment, and have inserted two new sections that have been printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. That will involve the question raised by the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. Partially so; yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have not examined his amendment, and I have not examined the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska on that question.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator prefer that I should not offer it now?

Mr. SHIELDS. I would.

Mr. NORRIS. I will defer to the Senator's wishes, then; but I might just as well offer another.

Let me call the Senator's attention to an amendment that was offered early in the discussion, to come in on page 3. Is he ready to take up that now? It went over at his request.

Mr. SHIELDS. Whose amendment was it?

Mr. NORRIS. That was the amendment of the Senator from Montana. It strikes out the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will offer no objection to that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I ask that that amendment may be voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, lines 8 and 9, it is proposed to strike out the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to page 9. I suggested to him that I wanted to offer an amendment there, and he asked me to defer that also. Is he ready to take up that amendment? My amendment will be to strike out, commencing in line 1, on page 9, the words "in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or"; and also, commencing with the last word in line 3, to strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. SHIELDS. In other words, I understand the Senator to propose to strike out all that part of the section that allows the permittee to institute proceedings in the United States district court for the condemnation of property needed?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the object of the amendment. That will be the effect of it if those two clauses are stricken out. The Senator will remember that I was going to offer that amendment on a former occasion, and he asked me not to do so then because he was not ready to consider it then.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am ready to dispose of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator ready now?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I move to amend the bill, on page 9, beginning with the word "in," in line 1, by striking out down to and including the word "or," in line 3; and beginning with the last word in line 3, to strike out the balance of the section, so that, if amended, the section will read—going back, now, on page 8, to get the run of the bill—

> When a grantee hereunder is a municipal corporation, or a political subdivision of a State, or a public-service agent of a State, or a public utility or service corporation, it may acquire the right to use or damage any lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such dam or diversion structure or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the State courts.

As it reads now, they can exercise the right of eminent domain—

> In the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located—

And also in the State courts. It provides, also, that—

> The practice and procedure in any action or proceeding brought for that purpose in the district court of the United States shall conform as nearly as may be with the practice and procedure in similar actions or proceedings in the courts of the State where the property is situated.

If the amendment is agreed to, the effect of it would be to confine the party to the State court in condemnation proceedings.

I do not care to take any of the time of the Senate in arguing the matter, unless such an argument might be suggested by what the Senator from Tennessee might say. I simply state the fact that the effect of this amendment would be to confine these parties to the State courts in condemnation proceedings. I concede that in other parts of the bill, where it is desired to cancel the lease, or in case there is a dispute about it, the United States courts would be the proper tribunal. But here is a case where a municipality or a person or a public-service corporation or any political subdivision of a State wants to divert the waters and build a dam; and in doing so it is necessary to take the private property of somebody else, some riparian owner or some other person who owns land in the vicinity that it is necessary to acquire in order to build the dam or other structure connected with the improvement. In such a case the bill gives them the right, if they want to do so, to commence an action of condemnation in the district court of the United States. It also gives them the privilege of commencing such an action in a State court. If the amendment is agreed to, the effect will be to confine them to the State court.

It seems to me that that would appeal to anybody as being a great deal nearer justice, and as tending to save a vast amount of money and a great deal of expense in litigation to which some individual who happens to own property there might be put if he were dragged away from his home into the United States court at a great distance, and compelled to litigate there to get the value of his property.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Take a case where a stream was on the boundary line between two States, or between one of our States and a foreign country. I think in such a case it would be eminently proper that the district court of the United States should have jurisdiction, because if it relates to two different States one end of the dam is in one State and the other end in another State. It seems to me it would be much better to have the district court handle the matter in that event, because there might be a controversy, and you might have to go then into both courts, instead of disposing of it in one court.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say, in answer to that, that if the change were not made the parties would be under the same necessity of going into two United States courts or two State courts, or one United States court and one State court. We can not get away from the fact that if the river or the stream that it was desired to dam was on a line between two States, and one man over here in Illinois owned land and another man over in Iowa owned land, there would have to be two actions. It does not make any difference what court you go into; and even under the bill as it is written you could go into the United States court over in Iowa and condemn one man's land, and into the United States court on the other side of the river and condemn the other man's land. You could not combine the two. It would not be right to join the two. The land involved would be in two separate districts.

I can not conceive of a case where the land that you are going to condemn will not be under the jurisdiction of a State court; and it is to the court in whose jurisdiction that land is located that you ought to be compelled to go, in order to save expense. Suppose it were on a line between the United States and Canada. The bill would not apply to it anyway, in my judgment, because we have not any jurisdiction whatever under our law to go over into Canada and condemn a man's land over there, and you would not get any authority under this bill, even as it is written, to do that. But, what would happen? We have here a stream between two States, and under this bill some corporation gets the right to build a dam across it, damming it up. Here is Mr. A, over in that State, who owns some land. Here is Mr. B, over in this State, who owns some land. If you leave the law just as it is, this corporation would go over into the State where Mr. A lives and commence an action. Under the bill it could commence it in the United States court or in the State court, as it pleased, and condemn that man's land. When it got through with that action, or at the same time it was pending, it would commence an action over in this State against Mr. B, and it could commence it either in the United States court or in the State court and get his land.

So that leaving the bill as it is does not save any trouble. There are two actions in that case just the same. It could not be otherwise. If you wanted to save these two men trouble you could not come over here and commence an action and join this man in it.

Suppose the amendment that I propose were adopted; what would happen then? You would come over here to Mr. A, and you would get him in the State court, and you would go over here to Mr. B, and you would get him in the State court over here. There would be two actions just the same in that case, of course, but they would both be in the State courts. You can not get any land anywhere that is not in some State, and some State court will have jurisdiction. Mr. A, who happened to own a little land along the river here, might be two or three hundred miles away from the place to which he would be hauled in the district court, and compelled to take his attorneys and his witnesses and travel across the State, perhaps, in order to defend against a large corporation. It would mean, in many cases, to the man of little means who had a little property taken under this bill, that it would cost him more to defend his rights than his rights were worth if he had to go across the country and get into the United States court. So it would give the corporation the opportunity, if he wanted to do so, to compel him to submit to almost any proposition it had to make.

What would be the justice of compelling these people to go into the State courts? If I went there or you went there, or you were building a railroad there, and you were going to condemn that man's land, he would get into the State courts unless, under some other rule, according to its value, he might get into another court. But why should we not confine the litigants in this case to the State court, located in the vicinity of the land, where the expense would be reduced to a minimum, and when you got through you would have gotten justice just as well as though you went away a couple of hundred miles and compelled the litigant to expend a great deal of money in defense of his rights?

There may be some reason. The Senator from Tennessee has not discussed it. The reason given by the Senator from Minnesota, I think, I have fully explained. It would not make a particle of difference. If there is any reason, I should like to know what it is. To me it looks like a plain proposition that in one case you will give to this large corporation—or it may be a county or a large city that is able to carry on litigation with attorneys that are paid a salary anyway—the power to take the fellow whose land they are going to take away off, away from his home or away from his land, where he will be put to an enormous expense as compared with the expense that he would be put to if he were left at home; and at the same time you will do the other party no good, unless you want to use this power as a leverage to compel him to submit to a settlement to which otherwise he would not submit.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this bill, so far as it provides that a public-utility corporation or municipality of a State may exercise the right of eminent domain in the State courts, is a mere recognition or recital of the law as it now exists in every State of the Union. This provision has been criticized by some of the opponents of the bill. They have gravely announced that this bill authorizes private corporations or public-utility companies to exercise the power of eminent domain and take private property, as if that were not a power with which every public-utility company in every State of this Union is already vested. The only operative part of this clause is that objected to by the Senator from Montana; that is, the part giving the Federal courts jurisdiction coextensive with that of the State courts. The sole object of that provision is that the company represents the United States in part of this improvement; that is, so far as it is for navigation purposes, that is a governmental purpose, and under this act the company is selected as a governmental agency to build the dam; and it was considered proper to vest jurisdiction in the Federal courts to that extent.

The Congress could not vest in the State corporation the power of eminent domain except in so far as that corporation was the agent of the General Government. Any further vestiture would be absolutely void, because the Federal Government has no power of eminent domain except to carry into effect a Federal purpose. It always has been considered proper to give jurisdiction to the Federal courts in all matters in which the United States was interested, and so far as my observation has gone it has been done in every statute upon the subject; and it was only in conformity to the general rule that this provision was inserted.

Now, as to the cost and expense: It is undeniable that the landowner would recover all the costs in the case, as there is always a judgment in favor of the landowner in a condemnation proceeding. It is just a question of value, and in every case he would recover full costs. There is something in the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that a landowner might have to go farther to attend a Federal court than a State court, and that was considered in formulating this provision; but it was believed that it would be best, so far as this corporation was acting as a Federal agent, to vest the authority in the Federal court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have said all I desire to say on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask a question, not to make a speech upon the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. This paragraph has interested me a good deal, and there is in my mind a very great doubt about this question. Assuming that the authority here provided for is given to the State or to a municipality, is the Senator of the opinion that a condemnation suit brought by a municipality under such circumstances would be a case arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, and if not, where is the congressional power to authorize this jurisdiction?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think it would be under the laws of the United States, because this is a bill making the State corporation an instrument of the United States for the improvement of rivers for navigation, and it has been adjudged by the Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases that Congress may vest that power in a State corporation, and they may exercise it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have little doubt about the authority of Congress to give that power to a State corporation, but I have very great doubt whether if the power is already held by the municipal corporation or by the public-utility corporation under the laws of the State a suit or proceeding instituted for the purpose of taking private property for public use would be a case arising under the laws of the United States. I do not intend to make any objection to it on that score, but I think it is a matter the Senator from Tennessee might well reflect upon.

Mr. SHIELDS. I examined the question, and if I had access to them I could produce the authorities—I have a memorandum of them—which would satisfy the Senator that Congress has the right to vest this power.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I feel as though I ought to say a word or two in reference to what the Senator from Tennessee has said. He concedes, he did the other day, that, so far as any constitutional right is concerned, we have the same authority to confide to the State court that we have to the Federal court, and he concedes that it would be more expensive as a rule for the litigants to go into the United States courts than into the State courts. All of us who have had any experience with courts know that that is true. The expense everywhere is greater. It sometimes happens, and it would sometimes happen under this bill, that a man who happened to own a little property by a river that was taken for a dam would have to go from three to four hundred miles away from home to defend himself and defend his rights.

What does that mean? His witnesses are all there right around this land. He would have to carry those witnesses across the State perhaps; he would have to pay their railroad fare; he would have to pay their hotel bills; he would have to transport his attorney, if he hired one at home; and the attorney who could best handle it would be one who knew about the circumstances. He would have to carry him, to pay his expenses, to pay his railroad fare, and when he got across the State perhaps the case would be continued. Perhaps it would be delayed several days. What does that mean? In a good many cases it means bankruptcy to the unfortunate man who happens to be defendant in the case, and he can not help himself unless he wants to give up his property at the other fellow's figures. He ought to have a right to defend himself in court without any extraordinary expense. There is not any claim made why it could not be done in one case the same as in another, and I am not claiming that. I am assuming that both courts would be fair and honest, and that he would get justice.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. SHIELDS. Under the clause providing for the condemnation of the property for navigation purposes the jurisdiction is given to the Federal courts, to the district court, where the land is situated.

Mr. NORRIS. To what law does the Senator refer?

Mr. SHIELDS. All our statutes, either general or special, providing for the condemnation of property for flowage over dams or other navigation purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator it is a fact.

Mr. NORRIS. All right, I will accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. SHIELDS. In my own city the district court has a large number of condemnation proceedings for navigation purposes and also for condemning land under the Appalachian reserve act. The landowner always recovers costs, of course; he always recovers his judgment for the value of his land, and the condemning party, the company, is not going to institute a proceeding in a court where there would be a very large bill of costs created when it knows it is going to pay it.

Mr. NORRIS. The costs of the case would be practically the same in one case as the other. It would be a little larger in the United States courts.

Mr. SHIELDS. You have in conformity with the general rule and in effect to protect the United States for the property to be taken over according to any proposition to be made here by the Federal Government, and it will pay to the company that made the improvement at least the cost of the property. Some might contend for an appreciated value, but under the amendment, I understand, it is contemplated that the Federal Government when the property is taken over will pay what it cost. Therefore, the Federal Government is directly interested in what these lands will cost the company, for in the end it will pay it when it takes it over; and in every statute I know of where there is a proceeding for the condemnation of property for a Federal use, jurisdiction is given to the Federal court. This statute would be anomalous, I think, with such a provision as is suggested; and so we thought when the bill was drafted, and it did not contain that provision. That is all there is of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, we will see if that is all there is of it, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. I meant to state to the Senator that was the motive I had and that the committee had in not inserting the clause.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not questioning the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Of course the Senator is not.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede the committee had a right to do what has been done, and the Senator has a right to advocate that. I am only claiming the same right to oppose it.

The Senator says the cost is going to be recovered in the judgment in any case. The court cost in the case is nothing compared to the expense outside the court. He would not recover attorneys' fees; he would not recover the amount which had been expended in paying railroad fare for attorneys and hotel bills for attorneys. He would not get back what he paid for the railroad fare of witnesses unless he had a written agreement with the witnesses that they should pay it back when they got their mileage. It is the cost, the expense probably I ought to say, outside the court.

There is not a lawyer here who does not know that he charges a different fee nine times out of ten when he goes into a United States court than when he goes into a State court, unless he is trying the case as a matter of friendship or charity. If he travels from home 200 miles, to be gone weeks, to attend a United States court, his attorney fees are going to be many times greater than though the person had hired a lawyer whose office was, perhaps, just across the street from the courthouse and who, if the case was continued, went back to his office. He would not be out of his office or out of the town, and he would not be spending any money for railroad fare and hotel bills. The witnesses would be at home. They would come into town and go from the courthouse to their homes, and there would be no costs of transportation. The costs which he would recover would not include any of the items I have mentioned.

If the Senator from Tennessee were employed as an attorney now by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to defend him where some corporation had taken some of the Senator's land up in South Dakota, and he had to go across the State into a United States court, it may be across two States, it may be he makes two trips or three trips or four trips, it may be that he is gone a week each time——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. Would the fee the Senator from Tennessee would charge the Senator from South Dakota be the same as though the case were pending in his home town, where in case of any delay it did not interfere with his transacting and doing other business? Would he not charge, in the first place, a greater fee for going into a United States court than he would to go into a State court? Would he not have to pay for all the time he spent traveling back and forth and the time of his delay? He would be taking all his time, not that the Senator's attorney wanted to be unfair, but it would be right. He ought to pay him more, and he would have to pay him more; he would have to devote more time to it, and that is what I want to avoid. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may not be able to see this matter in all its aspects, but the question I asked the Senator from Tennessee seemed to me to be very fundamental. If it be true that such a proceeding is a case arising under the laws of the United States, how can you deprive the Federal court of jurisdiction, inasmuch as the Constitution says the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and the laws made under it? I am entirely in sympathy with the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska, especially in condemnation cases. I think they ought to be tried at home, inasmuch as the value of the land always depends upon the opinions of those who live in the locality, and it is a hardship to take the witnesses from a given community a long distance in order to testify as to the value of the property. But I do not quite agree with the Senator from Tennessee about its being a case arising under the laws of the United States; but if it is, I am rather inclined to think a provision for giving the Federal court jurisdiction could hardly be avoided.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago when I first called the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to this provision I asked him the specific question the Senator from Iowa has propounded, or in effect the same question, whether he or the committee believed in putting the provision in here that that part of the bill would be unconstitutional if they gave this jurisdiction to the State courts alone, and whether that was the reason why they put in the provision giving jurisdiction to the United States courts. He said that had nothing to do with it, that there was not any doubt about the constitutional provision in his mind, and we would have a right to give the exclusive jurisdiction to the State courts in this kind of a case.

Mr. SHIELDS. I want to state to the Senator that I was mistaken, because I can see readily that if it was a right under the Constitution or laws of the United States or a treaty of the United States, I believe is the provision, that of itself would give the right to go into the Federal courts, and being a constitutional right Congress or no other power could deprive the party.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator from Tennessee takes a different position then to-day. Has the Senator changed his mind?

Mr. SHIELDS. No, sir. I have not; but the suggestion was made by the Senator from Iowa, and I think it is absolutely sound. His proposition is elementary. It had not occurred to me; but that is the difference between a good lawyer and one who is not so good. A good lawyer thinks always of all the legal propositions involved in a case.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will remember that I asked him the question when I first called his attention to this provision and when I intended to make a motion to amend, and the Senator asked me to put it over. But I did ask him the very question involved in the query of the Senator from Iowa, and he said at that time—and I think if he will look at the RECORD he will find that I am right—that there was not any doubt about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not remember.

Mr. NORRIS. I never looked it up after that because I assumed that question would not be raised.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not remember the colloquy.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt whatever that we have the right to say in this bill to the State corporation, for that is what it is, you shall go into a State court. It is just as easy for us to use the instrumentality of the State court for carrying out a Federal law as it is to use a United States court, and we have done it in a great many cases. I do not recall any to mind just now, but I do not believe there is any doubt about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest probably one way by which it could be accomplished anyhow, and that is by striking out the whole provision. It is absolutely useless, because, as the Senator from Tennessee said, there is not a municipal corporation or a State or a public-utility corporation in the land which has not under the laws out of which it arose the right to exercise the power of eminent domain.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I remember we have or we used to have a law on the statute books that was in force all over the United States, for instance, giving jurisdiction to State courts to naturalize United States citizens. There was not a State law on the subject. It came entirely from a Federal law. There is not a man in this Chamber who has been on a State bench who has not performed that ceremony many and many a time. The jurisdiction and authority come entirely from a Federal law. There is not any question about it, in my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I say that is not a case arising under the Constitution or laws. This refers to a controversy, a lawsuit, of course, and does not cover the matter of naturalization.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but if the objection made by the Senator from Iowa and now made by the Senator from Tennessee is good, it is because we are passing a law here which is a Federal statute and they claim we can not give jurisdiction to a State court to carry it out. Naturalization is peculiarly a Federal right, given to Congress by the Constitution. No State has any jurisdiction or authority to pass any law on the subject.

Here we have a State corporation to which the provision applies. Why should we not permit or rather compel the State corporation to go into a State court? The Senator from Tennessee gives as a reason, and he said that is the reason why the committee have put it in, because in the passage of laws heretofore Congress has always put in that kind of a provision giving jurisdiction in similar cases to United States courts. The virtue of that reason is one of great antiquity. It is hoary with age.

But, Mr. President, there has been a feeling for a great many years all through the United States that the United States court is a rich man's court. In answer to the public sentiment that we ought to limit as much as possible the jurisdiction of the United States court because of the expense, we have in Congress changed the law several times and curtailed their jurisdiction. That is a healthy public sentiment. Men, as far as I know, agree with it everywhere. Here it is only a question of getting common, honest justice. You are going to send a man away from home where he can be harassed, and harassed until he is bankrupt, when right at his door where the property is located, where the witnesses live, where there is everything connected with the case, there is a court ready to pass upon it and competent to pass upon it that will give justice just the same. It seems to me if we have always in the past, as the Senator has intimated—and there is a great deal in what he says—given the United States courts jurisdiction in cases like that we ought to stop now. It is a pretty good time to begin. We ought to save the expense of these litigants.

Mr. President, one of the criticisms against courts is that they wear out the poor man. He is worn out. He can not afford to contest with the corporation, especially in the United States court. The prejudice that has been upon the part of the great common people of the country against United States court has been that it is too expensive, that it means bankruptcy. You can talk from now until doomsday about recovering his costs. When he gets a judgment, that does not recompense him. He is in the poorhouse before the case is finished. By the time he follows that case four or five times with a dozen witnesses and a couple of lawyers the ordinary individual possessed of ordinary property is bankrupt before his case is even tried, and from there it goes to the circuit court of appeals and from there on to the Supreme Court of the United States before you get through with it.

Finally he finds that he has not anything left. It seems to me we owe it to such a man, whose property we are going to take without his consent, that we give him a fair opportunity to get justice at as little expense as possible.

I am admitting all the time that he would get justice in the district courts, but it will cost him too much to get it. I am not prejudiced against the United States courts. The criticism I make is as to the expense, especially, in a case like this. There may be cases—and in our laws we have given jurisdiction to United States courts that apply mostly to such cases—where there were not the peculiar circumstances surrounding them, that were entirely local in their character, where it would be perfectly proper to give a United States court jurisdiction, but you can not get such a case under this section. It is impossible to get a case but that all the evidence will be located right in the vicinity of the land that is taken. That is the forum where the dispute ought to be settled. If you leave it as it is, it may not be so settled. I do not say corporations always would do this, but it is within their power to do it.

I have seen—and every lawyer here knows of—many cases where, on account of some technicality, a litigant who was wealthy could get into the United States court, where the sitting of the court was a couple of hundred miles away from the man they were after, and they could go to him with a proposition for any kind of a settlement they wanted, and get it, because he knew it would be less expensive to him to give them what they wanted rather than to contest the right in a court, even a court that is absolutely just, but that was so far away that, from the very necessity of the case, a man would lose all his rights before he could get through with the litigation.

I can not see, Mr. President, why the committee should so bitterly contest this proposed change when the only reason they give for doing so is that this has been in similar laws—that it has been done before, and hence we ought to do it again. It would be a good thing for the Senate of the United States, I believe, if it broke a precedent once in a while. I believe we ought to take the step now, if this would be the breaking of a precedent. Because a practice is old is not a sufficient reason why we should follow it under all circumstances. Because an injustice has been done in the past in many of the laws which have been enacted, we ought to avoid a repetition of that injustice if we can do so now.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am so deeply and warmly in favor of the proposition made by the Senator from Nebraska that I feel inclined to again suggest to him that his amendment will not accomplish the purpose he has in mind. If his amendment is adopted, the proposed law would read:

> It may acquire the right to use or damage any lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such dams or diversion structure or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the State courts.

That is simply granting to the municipal corporation or public-utility corporation a right which it would have without any such language. Assuming, now, that a municipal corporation receives permission under this act to build a dam in a river, the laws of the State as well as what we propose here give to the municipal corporation the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, and the State courts are courts of general jurisdiction and anyone can bring a suit in them. The suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska simply prescribes an alternative which the corporation can exercise without any such authority, and my difficulty is to perceive how we can take away from a corporation which is exercising the right of eminent domain under a Federal statute the right to enter the Federal court if a case is presented which arises under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

I think if the Senator will present an amendment which will withdraw the right of eminent domain, which we here attempt to confer, that then a proceeding to take private property for use in connection with the building of a dam would not present a case arising under the Constitution and laws of the country. I hope the Senator will consider that suggestion, for, in my judgment, that is the only way in which the Senator can reach the end.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted for a moment, and I did not catch all of the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my suggestion is that if the Senator desires, as I know he does, to compel the trial of a condemnation proceeding in the State court, he must eliminate from this bill that part of it which confers upon a municipal corporation or a public-utility corporation the right of eminent domain, so that when any such corporation exercises the right of eminent domain it will exercise the right given to it by the State which created it. Then the proceeding would not be, in my opinion, a case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

I can not see how you can deprive the Federal court of jurisdiction of any case arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The effect of the amendment now pending would simply be to give to such a corporation the alternative, which I believe it will have anyway, of entering the State court rather than the Federal court.

I make this suggestion because I am in real accord with the Senator from Nebraska in the purpose he desires to accomplish, but I am not able to see my way clear to assume that it will do what he desires to have done. I shall vote for the amendment anyway, because I think it would not change the law as it would be without it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, permit me to say that I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa. I have great respect, of course, for his legal judgment, but I do not think there is any doubt that the Senator from Tennessee was right the other day; in fact, if he had expressed any doubt on that question, I think I would have been prepared to-day, with the proper authorities, to argue the proposition from a legal basis. However, I will say to the Senator from Iowa that, if this amendment is agreed to by the Senate, an amendment can easily be drafted, I think, that will comply with the idea of the Senator from Iowa; and I would be pleased to do that and consult with him in the drafting of such an amendment. It would be necessary in any event, however, to strike out the language which I have undertaken to strike out by this motion. If that is not accomplished, there will be no use of any further proceedings; and if it is, then I will be glad either to have the Senator from Iowa offer an amendment which he thinks will cover the matter, or, to satisfy his opinion, for which I have great respect, of course, I would prepare one and submit it myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CATRON (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is not present. I therefore withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I vote "nay." I take this occasion to announce that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. POMERENE (when Mr. SAULSBURY'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. KERN (when Mr. SHIVELY'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] and his pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

While I am on my feet I desire also to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is detained on business of the Senate. These announcements may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I inquire if the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator; but, understanding that if present he would vote as I intend to vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I understand, however, from his colleague that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the negative). I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. DU PONT. As I have a general pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Owing to the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but I am at liberty to vote on this matter, as he would vote the same way that I do. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness in his family. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow the amendment to be read, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. This is a personal matter and does not relate to any amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator want to bring it up before the amendment is stated?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes. As I say, it does not relate to any amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well; I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there appeared in an afternoon newspaper in this city on yesterday a news item in these words:

BITTER FIGHT IS DUE OVER SHIELDS BILL—FILIBUSTER MAY RESULT, TYING UP SENATE BUSINESS.

This week in the Senate will see an even more bitter fight than was waged last week against the Shields water-power bill.

A group of progressive Republican Senators, aided by some of the Democrats, are prepared to war at length on this measure, which they charge is a "power trust" proposition.

It is possible the fight will develop into a prolonged filibuster. Meantime other Senate business is nearly checked because of this contest.

Charges by Senator NORRIS and others that a powerful lobby representing water-power interests is in Washington in behalf of the bill have helped to stir up feeling and arouse interest in the struggle. Talk is heard of a demand for a lobby investigation.

There also appeared in a Tennessee paper Sunday morning under a Washington date line of February 26 a statement that Senator HUSTING would on Monday—yesterday—introduce a substitute for the bill under consideration, which is said to "satisfy conservationists who, under the lead of Gifford Pinchot, have objected to some features of the pending measure." And after purporting to set out the substance of the proposed substitute it is stated that "in an attack on the Shields bill to provide for water grants on navigable streams to private interests Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, declared the bill was being championed by the strongest lobby that ever came to Washington. They are the representatives of the water-power trust," he said, "which has its headquarters in Wall Street."

Another paper contained a statement that "conservation champions in the Senate plan to throw their combined strength against the Shields bill to provide for the leasing of water-power sites on navigable waters to private interests. They hope to amend the measure to the satisfaction of the conservation forces."

And then, after referring to the bill proposed to be introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], it states:

Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, charged in the Senate on Saturday that the strongest lobby the Capitol has seen in many years is here in the interest of the Shields bill, and that it is composed of representatives of the water-power trust which has its headquarters in Wall Street. The fight against the bill has almost reached the filibustering stage, as test votes so far on amendments indicate that the Shields bill has a strong following.

Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] use the language attributed to him in these communications, nor do I find any statement in the RECORD tending to support such a charge. The only statement concerning the interest of outsiders in this legislation appears in the RECORD of Saturday last. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said:

Why, we have had a great many reports here from various departments showing how the water-power business is interlocked, the same as all other business; how it is connected up with financial interests in Wall Street; and at these hearings we have had men from all over the country, interested in great financial institutions, begging Congress to pass a bill similar to the one that has been introduced here. I am not finding fault with these gentlemen, but they are not here for philanthropic purposes. They are here for an honorable purpose, I concede. They are fine gentlemen, as a rule, as far as I know. I know of no exceptions. But, Mr. President, they are asking us to give to them and to their clients rights and privileges that we ought jealously to preserve for all of the people of the United States. Even though the improvement suggested by the Senator from Utah does not come, even though we go no further than we have gone now, why should we not conserve these rights while we have the power to do so by giving to the officials of the Government a power of regulation?

On the same day in a colloquy between the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], this appears:

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, after all the contention there has been on this question and the care that apparently has been taken by the committee—I suppose in consultation with the representatives of prospective grantees under this bill—as to what would be satisfactory to those who wish to develop these water powers, the Senator from Colorado proposes to reopen the question here and make the bill more stringent than it has been heretofore against the public interest.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state that so far as I am concerned, I do not know any person that is applying for any of these water rights, and have no idea who is doing so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the entire time of men of talent and learning and ability and expertness in this matter has been devoted for two years, to my personal knowledge, to promoting the passage of this legislation. I did not say that the Senator from Colorado knew anything about it. I know about it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not even on the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Washington to say that the experts in regard to water power and the proposed development met in consultation with the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I said that I supposed the committee, which devoted so much time to the framing of this bill, or the members of the committee, had consulted with them.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is wrong in his supposition. There were no hearings. There were no experts and no promoters called before the committee or consulted. There are abundant hearings and reports upon this subject that have been accumulating during the last 10 years. The committee consulted and studied all of those and the general subject and framed the bill as they thought best to promote the development of these water powers and protect the interest of the consumers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I said did not necessarily refer to hearings before a committee. I did not say anything about hearings before a committee or any formal appearance before a committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator said that the committee——

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator declined to yield to me a moment ago. I decline to yield to the Senator any further at this time.

It seems to me it would be a very curious thing if gentlemen seeking these franchises and coming here should speak to me in regard to what they wanted and state their views as to the forms of bills, and not speak to members of the committee. Furthermore, I know, Mr. President, since reflecting upon it after the Senator's remark, that they have appeared before some of the committees of Congress. I know that they appeared before the Committee on Public Lands and testified in regard to this general subject more than a year ago. They have had motion-picture shows here in the city and in other cities agitating public opinion and promoting legislation satisfactory to them.

I have not any objection to legislation being enacted that is satisfactory to them, if it is reasonable legislation. What started this remark was the fact that the committee had agreed upon this bill, presumably satisfactory to the gentlemen who want to promote the development of water powers, and certainly stringent enough, so far as curtailing the public interest is concerned. Now, why should it be made more so by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator just exactly the circumstances under which it occurred. The Senator from Minnesota came in and asked the Senator from Tennessee what this meant. The Senator from Tennessee said that it meant "so far as the land was concerned." That had been the position taken by the Senator from Nebraska this morning in moving to strike out entirely the part of the bill that related to this. He said that it meant that, and a yea-and-nay vote was taken upon it. The Senator from Minnesota said that it was not clear to him, and ought to be made clear. I then suggested the pending amendment and asked whether that made it clear, and the Senator from Minnesota said "yes."

Those are the circumstances under which it occurred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The effect of it is simply this: That the bill, as it is framed now and reported by the committee and thrashed over here in debate for more than two weeks, and apparently accepted by the prospective grantees of these franchises, provides that in fixing the charges the Secretary of War can take into consideration the benefits accruing from the possession of this land to the business of the grantee. I think that is a reasonable provision. The amendment of the Senator restricts the basis upon which charges can be fixed, restricts the values which can be taken into account, and confines the Secretary to a consideration of the value of the land only.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the very argument that we have had here in connection with the motion of the Senator from Montana, by the amendment which he offered to strike out the words "value of the land," evidently went all over this matter; and the Senate determined by a yea-and-nay vote that you could not and should not charge for the water value that is in these streams, because it does not belong to the United States, and the United States has no more right to charge for it than I have. Upon that question a yea-and-nay vote was taken, and it was decided by a vote of 35 to 18. Then, again, the Senator from Nebraska moved to strike out this language, and the result of that was a vote of 38 to 20, I think. The matter has been settled twice so far as that is concerned; and when the interpretation of the Senator from Minnesota with relation to the matter was called to the attention of the chairman of the committee the chairman of the committee explained it. Thereupon he said, "If that is the construction, it ought to be in there"; so I moved to put it in.

And again the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said:

One of the men prominent in the development of water power who has been here a number of times is Mr. H. L. Cooper. I do not object to his having been here. The Senator from Tennessee resented the reference that I made to that as if there was something surreptitious or reprehensible about it. I do not think there was. I stated it for the purpose of showing, among other things, the value which these gentlemen attach to these franchises, evidenced by the fact that they are willing to give their time and labor for years to promoting legislation under which they are willing to accept them.

One of these gentlemen, as I say, is Mr. Cooper, a very honorable gentleman, so far as I know. He may be in the gallery now. He has been in the gallery at different times while this matter was before Congress. He is the engineer who constructed the dam at Keokuk, in the State of Iowa. He is regarded by a great many people as probably the foremost hydroelectric engineer in the country. He is interested in this legislation. I will say that in talking with him I formed the opinion that probably he was more reasonable in his attitude toward the interests of the public and the rights of the public in these matters than most of those who are seeking these franchises. He published an article in the Outlook Magazine a short time ago, and for the purpose of indicating, to some extent at least, the value which the franchises have to those who receive them I desire to read a short extract from his article.

And he proceeded to read from the article referred to certain extracts which are not pertinent to the present issue and I will not read them.

Mr. President, there is nothing in either of these statements charging that a formidable lobby representing a power trust of Wall Street is here pressing this bill or the Ferris bill, or that any improper influences are behind either one of them. On the contrary, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], referring to some gentlemen here interested in the bill, says:

I am not finding fault with these gentlemen, but they are not here for philanthropic purposes. They are here for an honorable purpose, I concede. They are fine gentlemen, as a rule, so far as I know. I know of no exceptions.

These remarks are just the opposite to what the newspaper correspondents attribute to these Senators.

There have been three gentlemen here, and only three so far as I know, interested in water-power development and favoring this bill. One of them is Mr. H. L. Cooper, to whom Mr. POINDEXTER has referred. I have not seen him during this session of Congress, but the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], after this bill was reported with a recommendation that it be passed, and while we were trying to get it before the Senate at the last session of Congress, carried me into the Marble Room and introduced me to him, and in a few minutes conversation Mr. Cooper told me that he favored the bill and that it would be a great thing for the country to have it passed, and that he hoped it would be pushed at that session, and I may say that in my efforts to get it before the Senate I had the full sympathy of the Senator from Montana, and I believe, while he desires the bill to be amended in some particulars, he now favors its enactment into law.

Another of the gentlemen is Mr. Henry J. Pierce, of Seattle, Wash., who has been a student of water-power development for many years, and in his researches has visited all the great plants in the United States, Canada, and Europe. I first knew of him by reading his testimony given last year before the Public Lands Committees of the Senate and the House and some able articles he wrote upon the subject, including an address he delivered at the Portland conference held last September by western people interested in water-power development. I also heard his lecture here in Washington in January last upon the subject, in company with the Senators from Washington [Mr. JONES] and Montana [Mr. WALSH], which lecture was afterwards published as a Senate document.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say to the Senator that the lecture was delivered upon the unanimous invitation of the delegation from the State of Washington, both the Members of the House and the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Some time after the bill was reported and placed upon the calendar I met him and have discussed water-power development with him on several occasions.

The Senator from Montana, in one of his addresses before the Portland conference, of these two gentlemen said:

Now, Mr. President, it was a most impressive and most pitiful story that was told to us last night by Mr. Pierce. His paper was a most valuable contribution to the conference being carried on here. Mr. President, if I had heard nothing else in the course of this Congress than that lecture last night I would have felt paid over and over again for my visit to the city of Portland. [Applause.]

We might just as well have that great cyanide plant down at The Dalles. There is no reason why you could not have one there and then duplicate it.

During the last session of Congress Mr. Cooper, the engineer who conducted the Keokuk Dam building, haunted the corridors of Congress begging for the passing of any kind of an act that would permit him to spend $10,000,000 for the construction of a nitrate plant at the border line between the States of Idaho and Washington.

Now, here is Mr. Pierce, with a grand proposition to develop 250,000 to 400,000 horsepower for irrigation purposes in the inland empire in the State of Washington. Yet not an advance has been made here toward a solution of this problem.

And from my brief acquaintance with Mr. Pierce I fully concur with the views expressed by the Senator from Montana of him. I have not discussed the subject other than as stated with Mr. Cooper, but I have read his testimony before the Public Lands Committee and found it very able and instructive.

I have also met here Col. George W. Worthington, of Sheffield, Ala., whom I knew before I came to the Senate, and it was from him some years ago I first learned of the great discovery of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by powerful hydroelectrical furnaces for the manufacture of fertilizers, and became interested in the subject.

These are the only gentlemen interested in this bill who have been here, so far as I know, and I venture to say that no one will charge them with any improper motives or using any improper influences.

The character and ability of the two gentlemen first referred to have been certified to by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and I have stated what I think of Col. Worthington, and in that I have no doubt the Senators from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. UNDERWOOD] will fully agree with me.

Mr. President, I have heard no charge that this was a bill of the water-power trust, except through the communication of Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and judging by his own letters to the President and the New York American and others, he is the most active party now interested in this bill. I have heard no intimation that there would be a lobby investigation, but the statement in the afternoon paper which I have read; but if there is any Senator in this Chamber who believes there ought to be an investigation, the friends of this bill—certainly, I for one—will welcome it, so that there may be an end to these false and unjust insinuations which some one opposed to this bill is constantly getting into the public print. Who the instigator of these publications is I do not know, but I leave it to Senators to infer from the letter of Mr. Pinchot to the President and his circular letter to the public press whether he is connected with them.

Mr. President, I would have just as much warrant as the author of these articles has to charge that this bill is in the interest of a water-power trust; to charge that the opposition to the bill comes from the railroad companies of the country to defeat the improvement of navigation in rivers to prevent competition in transportation, or from the coal interests, the Standard Oil Co. interests, and the natural-gas interests, to defeat the development of water power as a competitor to steam power, or to charge that the great water-power developments are opposing the bill to defeat further development to prevent competition in cheap power.

Mr. President, the provisions of this bill are grossly misrepresented in the letters of Mr. Pinchot to the President and the New York American, as every Senator in this Chamber knows, and such conduct can not be justified upon any ground.

I think his conduct fully supports the statement I made, that having once got in the limelight in connection with the Ballinger investigation he is trying to retain that position by his attack upon this legislation. For what other purpose could his letter to the President have been written but for notoriety? He knows as well as every Senator in this Chamber that President Wilson is fully informed of what is taking place in Congress and is fully able to take care of the interests of the people of the country whenever he deems it in danger without his aid or his conservation association, which, I understand, is composed of himself and his brother, or of any other person or association.

The charge has been repeatedly sent out from Washington to Tennessee papers substantially as I have read it here, and I have felt that it is not improper to make this statement. The charge that there is a filibuster in the Senate by both Democrats and Republicans for the purpose of defeating this bill is unjust to Senators who have been voting for amendments that have been offered to the bill, and should not have been made. All the charges made against them are absolutely untrue, and without the slightest foundation in fact.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the document I send to the desk be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it would be better for me to explain to the Senate why I objected to printing the article offered by the Senator from South Carolina as a public document. The Senate is taking recesses from day to day. There is no chance for morning business, and Senators on both sides of the Chamber have felt that as long as we recess from day to day no morning business should be allowed, and Senators upon the other side of the Chamber as well as this side have agreed that there should be none. I want the Senator from South Carolina to know that that was the reason why I objected to his request.

Mr. TILLMAN. The explanation of the Senator from Utah is satisfactory to me; but I did not understand what he meant at first. I thought it ungracious and ill-natured, and am glad he explained his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 6, after the word "hereunder" and the colon, insert:

Provided further, That no contract, which shall have been lawfully made, for power, light, heat, or water, or for the service or delivery of the same, to be furnished from such structures or their accessory works, and to which such structures or works, or the person, company, or corporation constructing, owning, or operating the same shall be subject, shall be affected by any permit under this act, and no such person, association, or corporation shall be released from any lawful obligation by reason of this act, or of any permit granted thereunder.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, we would like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amendment comes in at the place stated, Mr. President, on the page of the bill which provides that any companies operating structures in navigable streams at the present time may take out a permit under this act. The amendment simply provides, in substance, that the taking out of a permit under the act shall not relieve them from existing obligations or interfere with any contract they have heretofore entered into for the delivery of water, light, or power.

It seems to me to be a necessary and a very reasonable amendment. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not object to it. I can understand the need of such a provision from knowing of certain plants which are now in operation where the people who are operating them do expect to take out a permit under this act. I know that farmers, irrigators, and others who have contracts for water to be furnished from the existing constructors are very apprehensive that they may be deprived of their right by the successors of the existing company or the companies themselves acquiring a franchise under this act.

Mr. SHIELDS. As I understand the amendment, the provision affects the permit granted, and it is in these words:

That no contract, which shall have been lawfully made, for power, light, heat, or water, or for the service or delivery of the same to be furnished from such structures or their accessory works, and to which such structures or works, or the person, company, or corporation constructing, owning, or operating the same shall be subject, shall be affected by any permit under this act, and no such person, association, or corporation shall be released from any lawful obligation by reason of this act or of any permit granted thereunder.

That is an amendment offered to section 11 of the bill, which provides—

That this act shall not affect the rights of any person, company, or corporation as to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any structures heretofore constructed or upon which construction has been begun, under permit or approval of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers or other authority heretofore lawfully granted: Provided, That in the operation of any such structures and accessory works the provisions of sections 3, 7, 8, 12, and 13 of this act shall apply to the same extent as if such structures had been authorized under this act, and all conflicting provisions relating to the operation of said structures and accessory works contained in any authority heretofore lawfully granted are hereby altered, amended, or repealed so as to conform with the provisions of said sections 3, 7, 8, 12, and 13 of this act.

I understand the Senator from Washington proposes simply in a case where the company comes in under this act that it shall not be released from the contract previously made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is all. The bill itself has a provision in section 11, which the Senator has just read, protecting the operator of the existing structures, providing that he shall not lose any rights by the passage of the act.

The amendment that I offer simply extends that protection to the consumers of water or power from existing structures.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not think it is possible for this act to relieve the company of the contract. We could not pass any statute impairing the obligation of contracts. I see no objection to the amendment. I offer no resistance to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will then state in one word that it is offered under the same apprehension that the bill itself contains in the first provision of section 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to a slight amendment, which, it seems to me, is in line with what he offered on page 3. He struck out the words "without the approval of the Secretary of War." The amendment which I would offer is after the word "grantee" to insert the words "or tax sale," so that it will read:

And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, or tax sale, shall be made by any grantee—

And so forth.

That does not seem to cover it fully. It seems to me that it ought to be in the same class with the mortgages or the trust deeds that are mentioned here.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Colorado must not get my consent for the amendment. He should get the consent of the Senator from Tennessee. That is the important thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Nebraska had called particular attention to it. It seems to me it ought to be put in under a sale for taxes the same as in the case of a deed of trust or mortgage.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator put that in where those words are stricken out?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; after the word "grantee," in line 7 of page 3, so as to read:

And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, or tax sale, shall be made by any grantee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I caught the Senator's amendment right, it does not seem to me to quite fit there. He proposes to put in the words "or tax sale" between "grantee" and "shall," the last two words in line 7.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That would mean that a tax sale would have to be made by any grantee, which would be an impossibility.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me see how it would read. I am going to read it as it would read if the Senator's amendment were in, as I understand it:

And no transfer of any such permit or of the rights thereunder granted, except by trust deed or mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of such grantee, or tax sale, shall be made by any grantee.

That would mean that we are providing that a grantee should not make a tax sale.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course he can not. There is no doubt about it. That is a procedure. Where would the Senator suggest that it go in?

Mr. NORRIS. This is the first I have thought of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will withhold the amendment. I will look at it further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 15, strike out the words "as may be provided" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be fixed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let us have an explanation of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not all the amendment. I should like to have both clauses offered as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rest of the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 16, after the word "permit," insert the words "not later than such time as may be reasonably required for such completion if the work is diligently prosecuted."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator from Tennessee any objection to that amendment?

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to see how the words will come in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Secretary read it slowly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 15, strike out the words "as may be provided," and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be fixed," so as to read, "within such time to be fixed in the permit"; and in line 16, after the word "permit," insert the words "not later than such time as may be reasonably required for such completion if the work is diligently prosecuted."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the effect and purpose of the amendment is to require a time to be fixed within which the first unit of the project as specified by the Secretary of War shall be completed. Of course, one of the things to be avoided in legislation of this kind is the acquiring and holding of water-power sites for speculative purposes. I know it is the intention of the bill to avoid that. I think the language of the bill was intended to define that there should be a time limit, but it does not so provide. It simply says the Secretary of War may so provide, and it does not say what the provision shall be in case he does provide. The amendment says that it shall be fixed not later than such a time as will enable them to complete the work if they diligently prosecute it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that probably in all the States specific provision is made for the time when work of this kind shall be commenced and completed. This provision, if inserted in the bill, would be a direct violation of the statute of California, I know, and I think it would be of different States. It seems to me it might be better to leave that matter to the States themselves—to their statutes. I think the Senator will find that they require a good deal more extension work than we require by this bill in any of its provisions. One of the troubles about this bill, as I tried to point out the other day when I discussed it at some length, is that we are constantly undertaking to do by the bill what must be done by the States, and what has been done already.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Washington that I do not find here any provision that is contained in so many of the contracts, that in case of a strike, or from any other unavoidable cause, or where it is tied up by an injunction or something of that kind, it shall not run against a provision of this kind. It seems to me if you are going to limit it exactly to the time you ought to make the usual exception.

Mr. SHIELDS. The reason for not making the exception is, as the Senator will find, that the discretion is given to the Secretary of War to make an extension in proper cases.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether his State has not a statutory provision fixing the time when works of this kind shall be commenced and how they shall be prosecuted and when they shall be completed?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WORKS. And so in every irrigated State, I think.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; there is such a provision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in view of what was just said by the Senator from California and the Senator from Colorado, I think a word should be said. I would not like to have the impression go out that any such conflict as is suggested by the two Senators exists, at least in my own opinion. We have exactly the same provisions in my State as exist under the laws of the State of Colorado and the State of California. Those regulations appertain to the appropriation of the water right.

Under the law of appropriation, as it is generally administered in the Western States, the appropriator gives notice of his intention to divert the water from the stream. He is then required, under the laws of the State, in order to perfect his water rights, to commence work for the purpose of accomplishing the diversion within a certain limited time. It is also provided in the laws of many of the States that he must complete that work within a certain time; all this, however, for the purpose of establishing and bringing into existence his water right; that is to say, the right to take water from the stream.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana again yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I had not quite got through.

Mr. WORKS. Then I will not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this proposed act has not a thing on earth to do with the acquisition of the water right, the initiation, or the maintenance of that right. This act provides for and appertains to the construction of dams in navigable streams. The applicant for the permit comes to the Secretary of War, not for a permit to acquire a water right at all; he comes to the Secretary of War for a permit to put his dam in a navigable stream. He can not get that right from the State; the State has no power to give it to him; he has got to come to the Federal Government to get that right. The Federal Government says to him: "You can put your dam in this stream, but you will be obliged to commence your work within a certain limited time. If you do not commence within that time, your right to put your dam in a navigable stream is gone."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, it is clear, at any rate, whether the laws of the State, in the absence of some Federal legislation on the subject, would apply to the erection of dams in a navigable stream or not, that they would not apply after this act has passed as it is now framed, which gives the Secretary of War discretion for extending the time.

Mr. WALSH. I was endeavoring to convey to the Senator my idea about that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was doing the same thing.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I desire to say that if the applicant does not commence within the time limited by the act he has no right any longer to put his dam in a navigable stream; if he does not finish his work within a certain limited time, he will no longer have the right to put the dam in a navigable stream. If he does not at the same time comply with the law of the State and commence his work within the time required by the law of the State and end his work within the time required by the law of the State, he will not be permitted to divert any water from the stream. The two things, as we view the matter in Montana at least, relate to entirely dissociated matters, and both of them can exist without any kind of inconsistency.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a word, Mr. President, and then I will yield the floor. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that the amendment is only intended to carry out what I am satisfied was the purpose of the committee, but which they did not specifically put into the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has very accurately described what this bill ought to be, but not what it is. If the object and purpose of the bill were simply to grant the right to construct a dam in a navigable stream, I should have no kind of objection to it; but it is utterly impossible to separate the use of the water and the obstruction in a navigable stream. In dealing with this question the two must necessarily go together. The franchise, the right to construct a dam in the stream, would amount to absolutely nothing unless the party had the right to take the water out of the stream or to appropriate it, as we say.

Now, here is a proposition not only to control the construction of the dam, but also the use of the water. That is the viciousness of the bill against which I have been contending all along. As this dam is to be constructed in a stream within the State for the purpose of developing power, which in itself is an appropriation of the water for that purpose, the State has the right to determine when the work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed for that purpose. That right of the State is attempted to be taken away by saying that the Secretary of War may determine when this work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed, upon the theory that he is only dealing with a dam, as the Senator insists, and not dealing with the water. It is utterly impossible, as I have said, to separate the two. Unless it is for the purpose of appropriating water for the development of power, there is no occasion for seeking the right to construct the dam in the stream. That is the very object and the purpose of the application for the grant. When that grant is applied to the right to use the water that is the time when the State steps in and determines how that dam shall be constructed for the purpose of developing power. That, so far as this bill is concerned—although on its face it professes to be something else—is the only thing that is intended or the only thing that Senators here who are contending for the bill are interested in. That portion of it which relates to the improvement of navigation is a mere sham. This bill never would have been introduced for any such purpose as that. It has been advocated from the very beginning upon the ground that it is valuable and important for the purpose of developing power, and for nothing else. That is the reason and the object of pressing this bill, and that is the thing, Mr. President, in which the State has a right to act and to determine what shall be done by the National Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the statement that this bill is a mere sham is unwarranted by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WORKS. I did not say that the bill was a mere sham; I said that portion of it which assumes to legislate respecting navigation is a sham.

Mr. SHIELDS. And the corrected statement is also unwarranted by the provisions of the bill. I do not propose to be diverted to take time in discussing that question now, but Congress would have no jurisdiction to enact this bill unless it were a navigation bill. I do not contend, however, nor does anyone else pretend, that private companies would invest their capital in a navigation project unless they expected to get the benefit of the power created by it.

Mr. President, directing myself, I may say, to two amendments offered—because the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] relates to different matters, while the bill as written will be the same as it will after amended—I have no pride in the words used, and I agree to the Senator's first amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator will pardon me a moment and permit me to finish. I refer to the first amendment, the amendment inserting the words "to be fixed" instead of those now appearing, "as may be provided."

As to the second matter, however, in which it is proposed to insert the words "not later than such time as may be reasonably required for such completion if the work is diligently prosecuted," I think the Senator will not insist upon that. He has overlooked the fact that that provision is contained in lines 14 and 15 of the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On the same page?

Mr. SHIELDS. On the same page. Therefore I resist that amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken about what is contained in the bill, in lines 14 and 15, on page 14. That does not relate to what shall be contained in the permit; that is simply a requirement of the bill that the grantee shall proceed to prosecute the work diligently. My amendment proposes to put it in the permit, to make it a part of the permit—that is the difference—and I think it ought to be in the permit.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest that if that is the intention of my colleague, he has not expressed it in that way. The bill now reads in line 15, "and shall, within such time," and so forth. If the Senator inserts there the words to be fixed in the permit, "not later" than so and so, while that puts it in the permit, I do not think it carries out the intention.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the intention at least, where the amendment provides that it shall be fixed in the permit not later than such time as it can be completed if diligently prosecuted——

Mr. JONES. I think the suggestion of my colleague is exactly the same as that which is required on page 14, line 14, of the bill, where it reads "with due diligence." I should not have any objection to that language myself, except I think it is a pure repetition of what is already in line 14.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The only difference is that in lines 14 and 15, as I read the language, and as it seems to me anyone else would read it, it is simply an obligation imposed by the passage of this act.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest to the Senator that there is a provision making the provisions of the bill a part of the permit. It is the law of the case; it is a part of the enacting provision. I think, if the Senator reads the bill carefully, he will see that it would somewhat mar the bill to make the repetition. I hope he will not insist on that amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask that the first part of the amendment then be submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that part of the amendment in line 15, without objection, is agreed to. It is so ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask for a vote on the second part of the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Washington that there ought to be some reference, if he insists upon the balance of the amendment, so that it shall not be inconsistent with the laws of the State. For instance, in my State the law provides that such a work shall be prosecuted diligently, and in the case of certain works that they shall be finished within a certain time. It might be that, inasmuch as the State has jurisdiction over the power feature—that is, the power that may be generated—you would have to comply with the State law, because you would not get your water rights if you did not do that. Now, it seems to me, that ought to be tied in some way, so as not to make this absolutely arbitrary, but to make it in conformity with, or not inconsistent with, the laws of the State, within such time as would not be inconsistent with the laws of the State in which the improvement is made.

Mr. WORKS. I will ask the Senator from Colorado a question. Suppose that the State law required that the work should be commenced in 60 days and that it should be completed within a certain time fixed, and that the Secretary of War should provide that it might commence within a year and that it might be completed within two years. What effect would that have upon the water rights of the party who is proposing to use the waters of the stream for the purpose of developing power?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have very little doubt, Mr. President, that the State law would prevail——

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Because the United States Supreme Court has said time and again that the State has control of the water, and it can, of course, limit or enlarge the manner of appropriating the water for power purposes. On that account it does seem to me that there ought to be some provision inserted that it shall not be inconsistent with the laws of the State in relation to making the improvement referred to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I merely want to ask the Senator a question. The Senator does not mean that the laws of the State would control the time within which the dam which we authorize to be built shall be built, does he?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; where it is for the purpose of developing power and so far as it does not affect the question of navigation.

Mr. JONES. Every permit to erect a dam, as provided for here, is in the interest of navigation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is all true; but, notwithstanding that, the permittee is going to get certain water-power rights for light and for other purposes. That being the case, he must go to the State in order to get them; and when the State statute prescribes certain things, they must be complied with.

Mr. JONES. The State law prescribes the terms upon which a man can get the right to use the water out of a stream, but it does not seem to me that it can control the building of such a dam as is contemplated by this bill. A man might fail in complying with the State law in other respects, but I do not believe the State could interfere with the terms that we impose as to the building of the dam itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, well, whatever the State law is with relation to the appropriation of water for power purposes it must be complied with.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; but that has nothing to do with the building of a dam under this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. An applicant may find that his right is going to be contested by somebody else who has a right, perhaps, above the navigable portion of the stream, and the question may arise whether or not that right can be contested, whether the man in the upper reaches of the stream can by a reservoir or by any other means hold back the water which the other man might desire to employ.

It does seem to me that, inasmuch as the appropriation of water is to be made under the State law, if it is going to be used for power purposes, there ought to be something in the bill, so that the rights of the permittee will not be vitiated; and to that end we should provide that there shall be no conflict with the laws of the State, or something of that kind.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Washington are both perfectly right in saying that, so far as the mere construction of the dam is concerned and its effect upon navigation, the Secretary of War can determine when the work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed. There is not any doubt about that, because it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the National Government; but this bill provides for something else. It provides for the putting in of a dam for the purpose of developing power; and whenever you attempt to do that, you are then trenching upon the rights of the States.

The trouble about it, as I have said before, is that you are attempting to combine these two things together; and I suggest to the Senator from Washington that, admitting the fact that the dam may be constructed in conformity with rules and regulations of the Secretary of War, if the time of constructing the dam should be put off for a year and somebody else should appropriate that same water, the party who is constructing the dam will be left without any water rights to develop the power. I should think a man who was seeking to get the right to erect a dam in a navigable stream would want to comply with the laws of the State in order to protect his individual right to the use of the water for the purpose of developing power.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel justified in saying, indeed I feel compelled to say, another word about this matter. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] in the last sentence which he uttered has disclosed the situation absolutely. If the Federal law contemplates that work must be commenced within 60 days and finished within two years and it is not commenced within 60 days or is not finished within two years, the right to put the dam in a navigable stream is gone. On the other hand, if under the State law, in order to acquire a right to divert water from the stream, the work must be commenced within 30 days and finished within a year; if it is not finished within a year, the man will have no right to divert water from the stream. Even if he has a Federal permit and he does not divert the water from the stream within a year, he has lost his right, under the State law, to divert the water, and another man may go above him on the same stream and divert all the water of the stream; and when he has completed his dam below at the end of two years he has not a drop of water in it.

Mr. President, the only thing he can do is to hurry his project to completion within the time required by the State law, or the State law will authorize some one else to go up above him and take all the water out, and his improvement will be valueless to him. So that he is under a compulsion. There is no inconsistency about it at all; and there is no necessity for any such amendment as is suggested by the Senator from Colorado. The applicant must comply with the Federal law in order to occupy the stream, and he must comply with the State law in order that he may have the right to divert the water from the stream at all.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana and myself agree entirely as to what the law is on the subject and the effect of it; but it seems to me that we are going to mislead anybody who proposes to put his money into a venture of this kind by any such provision as that contained in this bill. While we are at it we might just as well enact a statute that will protect the man in both directions—in the right to put in the dam and in the right to take out the water. It can very easily be done by simply providing that, so far as the appropriation of the water is concerned, it shall be governed by the laws of the State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 2, after the word "required," it is proposed to insert "and the United States may purchase at said sale, but in case of such purchase the United States shall not be required to pay for any value attaching to such plant or structures by reason of any franchise or permit acquired under this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask on what page and line that amendment comes in?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, that provision is already in the bill, and it would be a mere repetition. The bill expressly provides that——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SHIELDS. It expressly provides that the franchise or any of the rights granted under this bill shall not be charged to the value of the property.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That applies to the taking over of the property by the United States at the expiration of the 50-year period. There is no such provision as that where it is taken over for violation of the law. This merely repeats the principle which the Senator has put in the bill with reference to the other matter.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, would it not follow that the United States would take it over on account of violation of the law free of charge? If it would not, then the Senator's amendment is certainly in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bill now provides that in case of violation of the law the United States may bring suit in the United States court and have the property condemned and sold. My amendment simply provides that the United States may purchase at that sale, but in so purchasing shall not pay for its own property. That provision is nowhere else in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I wish to propose one of a number of amendments of which I have given notice and which have been printed. On page 11, line 5, beginning with the word "Provided," I move to strike out down to and including the word "granted," in line 22, of the same page, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And in the event that any State shall not have provided a commission or other authority for the regulation and control of such charges, rates, and services, such regulation within such State shall be made and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon and vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, either upon its own motion or upon the complaint of any person aggrieved, to enforce this provision: Provided, That all charges, rates, and services by the grantee hereunder shall be nondiscriminatory, reasonable, and adequate to the public in view of the cost of production; and in computing such cost of production, the investment of the grantee shall be valued according to the rule laid down in section 6 of this act for compensation to be paid in the event of the taking over of the property of the grantee, but there shall be also included therein all the property of the grantee used in the distribution of power beyond the initial point of distribution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment read at the desk. I could not hear clearly the reading of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 5, beginning with the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That where the said power or any part of it shall enter into interstate or foreign commerce, the rates, charges, and services made and rendered, shall be reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and adequate to the public; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon and vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce this provision, upon the complaint of any person aggrieved, in the manner and according to the procedure and practice of that commission in fixing and regulating the rates and charges of railway companies, the grantee to have the same rights of hearing, defense, and review as said companies in such cases: And provided further, That in the valuation for rate-making purposes of the property of any such grantee there shall be included the cost to such grantee of the construction of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation, and all other capital expenditures required by the United States, but no value shall be claimed or allowed for the rights hereby granted—

And insert—

And in the event that any State shall not have provided a commission or other authority for the regulation and control of such charges, rates, and services, such regulation within such State shall be made and enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon and vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, either upon its own motion or upon the complaint of any person aggrieved, to enforce this provision: Provided, That all charges, rates, and services by the grantee hereunder shall be nondiscriminatory, reasonable, and adequate to the public in view of the cost of production; and in computing such cost of production, the investment of the grantee shall be valued according to the rule laid down in section 6 of this act for compensation to be paid in the event of the taking over of the property of the grantee, but there shall be also included therein all the property of the grantee used in the distribution of power beyond the initial point of distribution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that he withhold that amendment until the amendment which I offered to-day, but which went over at the request of the Senator from Tennessee, is disposed of. I think he might wish to modify his amendment, for I do not think section 6 as now in the bill would meet with the Senator's idea of the regulation which should be provided for. I have offered an amendment which I think will cure the defects.

Mr. HUSTING. Then I will be very glad, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, to let my amendment go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest to the Senator that he offer one of the other amendments which he desires to present and withhold this one until we have disposed of section 6.

Mr. HUSTING. I suggest, then, that the amendment lie on the table.

Mr. President, I wish to offer another amendment, unless the Senator from Washington desires to submit one.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I move to strike out all of section 10 and insert the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCLEAN in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 10 and insert:

SEC. 10. That the said Secretaries be, and are hereby, authorized to enter into leases for the use of surplus water and water power generated at dams and works constructed wholly or in part by the United States in the interests of navigation at such rates, on such terms and conditions and for such periods of time not to exceed 50 years and with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as may seem to him just, equitable, and expedient, subject, however, to the provisions of this act governing the authorization, maintenance, and operation of power plants and to all regulations governing the use and disposition of power so far as the same may be applicable; and all such leases, the parties thereto, and the terms and conditions thereof shall be reported annually to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator that the wording of this amendment would not apply to the balance of the bill; that is, it would not be in conformity with the balance of the bill. The balance of the bill refers only to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War is granted whatever powers are granted under the bill. As I remember the amendment, as it was read by the Secretary, it refers to "the Secretaries."

Mr. HUSTING. I ask unanimous consent to change that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator would like to have it say "the Secretary of War"?

Mr. HUSTING. The Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin modifies his amendment by inserting the words "Secretary of War" instead of "Secretaries."

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, before discussing this amendment I desire to say a few words in reply to what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] said this afternoon.

I do not know what the purpose of the Senator from Tennessee was in reading newspaper excerpts in regard to the bill which I introduced, and I do not understand whether the Senator intended to say that the excerpts read by him from the RECORD or from the newspapers were intended to mean that I had anything to do with the charge of lobbying or not.

Mr. SHIELDS. Why, certainly not, Mr. President. There is nothing in my remarks making any reflection upon the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator what he meant by reading the excerpts from the Tennessee newspaper to the effect that the statement was made by Senator HUSTING on Monday that he would introduce a substitute for the bill under consideration, which is said to "satisfy conservationists, who, under the lead of Gifford Pinchot, have objected to some features of the pending measure."

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee made any such statement.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator from Tennessee read that excerpt from a newspaper.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, I was stating what appeared in the papers of Tennessee; but I am not charging the Senator from Wisconsin with representing Mr. Pinchot on this floor. I did not have any such thing in my mind.

Mr. HUSTING. May I ask the Senator what was his object?

Mr. SHIELDS. It was to present the attack that is being made upon myself through some one in Washington in the papers of Tennessee.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to say to the Senator, in the first place, that I do not know whether there is any lobby here on this bill or not. I would not know one if I saw one, I presume. I certainly have said nothing that could be understood as conveying any such idea. I do not know whether it is so or not; and I want to state to the Senator that nothing I have said at any time could be construed to mean anything of that kind.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Tennessee has made no such charge. I did not remember that one of those extracts purported to give the words of the Senator from Wisconsin. I thought it simply purported to state what he was going to do, without stating that he himself had said that he was going to do it. I have not the extracts before me now.

Mr. HUSTING. I supposed the Senator intended to convey some such meaning in connection with the charge of a filibuster, or an understanding with others on the floor to filibuster on this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not make the charge. The afternoon paper said that it was going to be done. In the conclusion of my remarks I said that I desired to read that in order to exonerate any Member of the Senate of the charge made. On the contrary, I denied, for every Senator, that anyone was filibustering.

Mr. HUSTING. I merely wanted to say, in justice to the bill and in justice to myself and in justice to the Senator, that while I have a very high opinion of Mr. Gifford Pinchot, and think he has rendered the country a distinct service in calling public attention to the manner in which the administrations that preceded the one with which he was connected were handling the public domain, yet I have never had the honor personally to meet Mr. Pinchot, and do not know him. Consequently, I have not been in any communication with him, and he has had no part, so far as I know, in the drafting of the amendment introduced by me. Furthermore, I wish to say that the same was drafted without being submitted to any Member, either Democratic or Republican, before introduction. I merely say this in order to have the Senate look upon the measure upon its merits, if it has any, and in order that any personalities or any influence which might bear against the consideration of the bill on its merits may be removed.

I do not know whether the amendment to which I refer will satisfy the conservationists or not. I sincerely hope so. I sincerely hope it will satisfy the people of the country, because the amendment which I have had the honor to introduce here is intended to conserve the public interests in the navigable waters. Therefore I hope it will meet the approval and favor of all the conservationists and all the people who believe in proper regulation and control over navigable waters. I also indulge the hope that it may meet the approval of the Democratic Senators, as well as the Republican Senators on this floor.

I merely want to say in passing that I had no other object in the drafting and introduction of this amendment than to attempt to prepare a measure which might be in line with the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore. I did not believe that the bill introduced by the Senator from Tennessee was such a bill as was contemplated by the platform adopted by the Democrats at Baltimore. Consequently I have attempted—with what success I can not say—to draft one that somewhere nearly complies with the requirements of the plank in the Baltimore platform.

I want to read, in that connection, an excerpt from the platform:

We believe in the conservation and the development, for the use of all the people, of the natural resources of the country. Our forests, our sources of water supply, our arable and our mineral lands, our navigable streams, and all the other material resources with which our country has been so lavishly endowed constitute the foundation of our national wealth. Such additional legislation as may be necessary to prevent their being wasted or absorbed by special or privileged interests should be enacted, and the policy of their conservation should be rigidly adhered to.

I want to say that with that in mind I drafted the amendment introduced by me, and I hope to discuss it before the vote is taken on the pending bill.

Coming down to the amendment before the Senate, I want to say that this amendment provides that the Secretary of War—

Shall be authorized to enter into leases for the use of surplus water and water power generated at dams and works constructed wholly or in part by the United States in the interests of navigation, at such rates on such terms and conditions, and for such periods of time, not to exceed 50 years, and with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as may seem to him just, equitable, and expedient, subject, however, to the provisions of this act governing the authorization, maintenance, and operation of power plants, and to all regulations governing the use and disposition of power so far as the same may be applicable; and all such leases, the parties thereto, and the terms and conditions thereof, shall be reported annually to Congress.

That takes the place of section 10 of the original bill. I submit that that provision should be adopted and that section 10 should be stricken from the bill. I think that by the adoption of this amendment leases for the use of surplus waters and water power generated at Government dams will be so regulated that the people will get such benefit as they are entitled to have from the sale of power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I merely want to say that this is a very important section, and the substitute for it utterly fails to accomplish the purposes of the bill. I hope it will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, on page 7, at the end of section 2, I move to insert the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, at the end of section 2, it is proposed to insert:

The said Secretaries——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin wish to modify that amendment, so that it will read "The Secretary of War"?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of War may provide, as a condition of such approval, for the payment to the United States of reasonable annual charges for the benefits that accrue to the grantee by the authority given under this act, and at the end of 20 years and every 10 years thereafter the Secretary of War may readjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask to what section that is an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that it is to come in at the end of section 2, on page 7.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, this question has been before the Senate in a little different form, and yet not in this identical form. This amendment provides that at the end of every 20 years, and every 10 years thereafter, the Secretary of War may adjust the annual charges as may then be just and reasonable. I believe this amendment should be adopted, for the reason that the imposition of a charge is a reasonable thing, and one that should be put into every measure of this kind, and so that these valuable franchises should not be granted away as a special privilege unless the public derives some direct benefit from them in this way.

I do not care to discuss this amendment at length at this time, because it is evident to me that it will be rejected. I prefer to withhold my views until the substitute amendment which I am going to present to the Senate to-morrow, if possible, is before the body, when I will discuss at length the question of compensation. I wish to say briefly, however, that this right to charge does not depend, as seems to have been taken for granted by those opposing the measure, upon the ownership of water in navigable streams. It depends upon the franchise or the license which is issued to those who come to the United States and desire to have from the United States a privilege which is not enjoyed, as a matter of common right, by the ordinary citizen.

The so-called Shields bill makes no provision for any compensation, but it does provide that public utilities and municipalities may receive these licenses. There is no question in my mind that those who will take readiest advantage of that bill will be the public utilities. I dare say not one out of ten of these corporations is a riparian owner or has any rights on any navigable stream; but upon the passage of this act they will come before Congress or the proper Secretary and ask for a permit or a license. A license to do what? A license to go and seize somebody's land under condemnation proceedings; to seize an available water-power site that somebody owns, that he may not want to sell; to take it from him under condemnation proceedings and pay him what that land is worth, not as a potential water-power site, but as land adjacent to and abutting on the water. They will take it by the right of eminent domain. They will not give this man compensation for the value that is going to be put into the land by virtue of the license or special privilege that they get from the Government, but they will pay him the naked value of the land according to the rules laid down in the Dunbar case. Not only that, but they will put up a dam, and they will back up the waters of the river, taking away all the fall that other riparian owners have, and seizing their land, their water-power privileges, if they have any, and pay to them only compensation for the bare land, so that finally they will come into possession of a water power; and when they come into possession of a water power, enjoying a monopoly in that neighborhood, they will, for all this bill says, take profit from the public, based not upon the amount of money they put into it but upon the value of it as a developed water power; and thus they obtain from the United States Government a privilege that is valuable in dollars and cents.

In the Chandler-Dunbar case, in the condemnation proceedings, the owners of the land claimed $2,000,000 over and above the actual value of their property for the so-called raw water-power value. In fact, the court below allowed them $400,000 over and above the value of the land for the mere raw water-power value, which the United States Supreme Court subsequently set aside. Now, if property of such great value springs from such a license, why should not the licensee pay the United States Government something for this great privilege—something for this privilege that is denied the other men who are owners on that stream, who have just as much natural right as riparian owners, and, in fact, greater rights than the corporation that gets its license from the public?

When Senators ask "Why should they pay?" I should like to put the question, "Why should they not pay?" What are they? Why, the only excuse, the only justification for the gift or grant of this privilege to these men is that they are fulfilling some sovereign function, that they are invested with some sovereign power, namely, the power of eminent domain, the power to serve the public, and because they are deputed by the Government as an agent of the Government.

In the Chandler-Dunbar case the United States took this property from the Chandler-Dunbar Co. The court at the same time held that in taking that property and taking over the water power the United States need not be blind to the value of the power; that the water that they did not need for purposes of navigation could be sold to the public at such rates as it saw fit to impose, and that the United States could put the profits, whatever they might be, in the Government's Treasury.

I did not read the evidence in that case, but I understand that the amount of water needed for navigation up there is just 2 per cent of the whole, and that 98 per cent of the water is available for water power. Anybody familiar with the conditions up there knows, without having seen the evidence, that only a very small percentage of the water can be used there or made available for navigation. There is a large stream, the St. Marys River, that empties down the rapids, and immense quantities of water are running over the falls.

The Chandler-Dunbar Co. ran a wing dam out into the stream, catching the water and running it through their flumes and through their mills. They were using some water. The greater quantity of the water was going to waste. All the water they could use there for purposes of navigation was used in double locks, in which the boats passed from the lakes below to the lake above. All that is necessary to fill the requirements of navigation is to fill these locks with water when boats come up and empty them when they go down. The boats in coming up from below, of course, enter these locks, and enough water is let in from above to raise them so that they can pass on above, and vice versa in going back; so that a very small percentage of the water—certainly not over 10 per cent—is used for navigation. And yet the court held that the United States, to gain the 2 per cent of that water for purposes of navigation, could take over the entire power plant—the 98 per cent—and use all of the available water power if it wanted to, and sell it for such prices as it might get.

I have heard some arguments here to the effect that the United States did not own the water. It does not; but it has a right, recognized by the Supreme Court, to take property of that kind without compensation for purposes of navigation, and then it can use these water powers in any manner as it may see fit. If the United States can do that, then the United States, instead of passing a law of this kind, would have the power to go anywhere upon the navigable waters, condemn land if it does not own it, or on the public domain, to build dams in the national forests. It can take lands there and build these dams to improve navigation; and in improving navigation must it be blind to the fact that, having done that as incidental to such improvement to navigation, it is very valuable for water power?

It would seem, from some of the arguments I have heard, that it is wrong for the United States to exercise the power which it may exercise; that it ought to be blind to the value; that it ought to be helpless in using these great resources for the common welfare. It does seem to me that when courts recognize these rights, when these rights have been recognized since time immemorial, or as long as the Government has existed, and the United States has it within its legitimate power to take possession of our navigable rivers and improve them and incidentally to use the power that is generated there, that then it is a power within its grasp and control and which it is free to use for the common welfare.

There are a great many people who think that the United States should do this, and that instead of passing water-power laws of this kind it should go into the business of developing its own streams, and incidentally to own and take charge of all the water powers. It is plain, however, that a bill of that kind could not pass at this time, although the time may be not far distant when such a bill will pass; and so we are necessarily obliged to delegate this function, this right, to others.

In delegating to them this right of building dams, in giving them the right to develop water power in connection with this public duty that has been delegated to them, why should we be utterly heedless and regardless of what these things, that are almost necessarily incident to the improvement of navigation, mean to the people of the United States and how closely the future welfare of our people is woven up and dependent upon the proper development and use and control of these potential water powers? Certainly if any Government in the world has been richly endowed with natural resources, it has been the United States. We claim to be the most intelligent people on the face of the earth and the most practical people, and yet our forefathers permitted the coal fields, the oil fields, the forests, the mines, and everything to pass into private ownership. Why is it we did not retain the right to control the price of coal? Why is it we did not lease the coal lands instead of selling them in fee? This generosity or prodigality—whatever you want to call it—was not of any particular benefit to the man who got it originally. He sold it to somebody else, and he to some one else, and so on, and now the operators in the coal fields are paying a royalty to individuals much higher than the United States would ever have exacted, when a royalty ought instead to be flowing into the Treasury of the United States.

It is said if you lease land you will stop development. I dare say to-day that if the United States had the fee in its coal fields the operator would be getting terms and paying such royalties by a thousand per cent less than they have to pay now because we turned it into private ownership. So with the oil; if we had conserved our oil or had retained the right to control the price of oil, if we would not have gotten anything more out of it than the control of the price of oil, we would be in a far different position than we are to-day. We gave the fee at a dollar and a quarter an acre. We sold it to somebody and he sold it to somebody else, and now the oil operators are paying a royalty far in excess of what they would have had to pay the United States, and these revenues are going into private pockets instead of into the Treasury of the United States. So we might go on with all these natural resources and point out how we have been blind to our own interests and have disposed of our rights in these great resources without proper reservations.

Now, with the large domain still in our hands we should reserve the mineral rights. I have heard it said over and over again that if we reserve the mineral rights in agricultural lands they will not be developed. I know an instance in my own State where there was a land grant made to the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. of I do not know how many hundreds of thousands or millions of acres of land without any reservation whatever. Those lands were all in northern Wisconsin, near the deposits of iron ore up there, and now after the Wisconsin Central had these lands in fee it sold them to the farmers, but reserved all the mineral rights in the lands to itself. So we merely passed it over to the Wisconsin Central. It sold the lands and reserved the mineral rights therein, and there was no appearance of stopping or hindering the development of those lands, which it must have been just as interested to develop along its right of way as the United States could be.

Now, why did the United States dispose of our land without proper reservation of any kind? Why did not the United States retain the fee and only lease those lands on a royalty basis? I presume it was not done because of arguments similar to those being advanced against that proposition now. It seems to be taken for granted that unless the United States disposes of its holdings of everything with utter disregard of what it is worth everybody will refuse to do business with or will boycott Uncle Sam, and that our people will lie down and stubbornly refuse to invest their money or do business in any way because of their resentment.

Now, we are engaged in the disposition of another resource—flowing water. It is true that the United States has no title to flowing water, neither has the riparian owner any title in the flowing water. If the riparian owner had any property in flowing water, this body could not take it away from him by mere legislation. In the Chandler-Dunbar case, when the United States asserted its right through an act of Congress, it was held that they had a shadowy right, but no property right in the stream, and therefore that we could take it and they must get out.

That case was rather a hard one. The Chandler-Dunbar Co. had received a license for the construction and development of its water power. It had constructed its buildings and supposed that the lease was one which might continue without end. The United States stepped in, however, and took it away and gave them only such compensation as the property was actually worth.

We are about to legislate in some way on the same water-power question. We ought to pass a law that will fully conserve all the rights that the people have in these great resources.

I expect to read some statistics in connection with another amendment, showing the great amount of horsepower in the country, and that a very small per cent of it has been developed. The development is still in its infancy. We should make such terms now that those who take it will know exactly what rights the Government has and what rights it is going to assert.

Those who apply for these licenses fully understand the value of these water powers. I do not think the value of them was fully comprehended until the development of the transmission of electric power for long distances from the site of the power plants operated by them. Formerly the power was unavailable except at dam sites. Now by transmission lines the power may be conveyed a long distance, perhaps eventually a thousand miles, perhaps more, and it will be used in the development of the country from ocean to ocean.

Mr. President, we can not be blind to what electricity is going to mean in the future. There would not be such an awful fight going on about these great resources if we did not know how valuable it is and if those who want to get their hands on it did not know how valuable it is. The tremendous influence the development of electricity is going to exert in the next 25 years no man can foresee. The power plants are going to be the very heart in our industrial system and will have to be depended upon to pump the blood of commerce through the veins of the country. It is going to run this country. If anybody wants to run this country, all he has got to do is to get his hands on the power that runs it, and any bill that is put through Congress which puts control of the electrical power into the hands of private persons or private corporations or even public-utility corporations is going to take our own self-control out of our hands irrevocably, and nothing that any human being can foresee will ever get it away from them again.

If this bill is put upon the statute books and left there for two or three or four years it is safe to say that enough valuable power sites will be seized upon, whether they are developed or not, and the damage done the country can never be repaired.

This is the right conception, and when we see the possibilities of this tremendous power getting into private hands for private profit it does seem to me that we should put every safeguard around such power that we can possibly put around it. We still hold the key to unlock the water-power treasure houses of the country. Let us not part with it to anyone.

It is far better that the power should be safeguarded than that we should be hurried away with the idea that it is going to be immediately developed. I have heard a great deal of discussion about the lack of development in the last six or seven years. I expect to read some statistics on that point to show that it has not been quite as little as has been represented. Everyone knows that since 1907 industrial development in the United States has not progressed in the same ratio as it did before, but even before 1907, before 1900, before 1890, before the law that is complained of was put upon the statute books, those potential powers had been there for untold tens of thousands of centuries and had not been developed. No one need think that with any kind of a law they will all be developed in a few years. The statistics show that in a great many cases power has already been overdeveloped, that the supply of power in some locations is more than enough to supply the demand, and, of course, power will not be developed unless a market is available for the sale of that power.

But even if a law does, in a way, hinder the immediate development, there is no necessity that all development should be made in a day or a year. Here we are on the very verge of a great hydroelectric development in the United States. The United States still has the control of it in its hands if it wants to use it. It has the power and right to control this power, and with it to control the industries and the men or corporations to whom it delegates this power for use. We still have that within our hands.

A large percentage of the powers in our national forests are still in our absolute ownership or control, yet it seems there is an inclination here to turn these all loose into private hands, with substantially no control, so that we may find ourselves, in 25 years from now, bound hand and foot by the power which was ours and which we thoughtlessly turned over to private interests.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize that the States are doing their very best to prevent monopoly and to regulate rates? I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a report which was made by the utility commission of the State of Colorado at the end of the last year. It reads as follows:

BOARD SAVES MILLION, ACCORDING TO PUBLIC-UTILITIES REPORT TO GOVERNOR—RAIL-RATE REDUCTIONS BRING BENEFITS TO COLORADOANS—EXPENSES, $31,465—ONLY TWO CASES ON DOCKET.

More than $1,000,000 was saved to the people of Colorado through investigations and reductions of railroad passenger and freight rates and those of public utilities, according to the annual report of the public-utilities commission, submitted to Gov. Carlson.

This saving, according to the report, was effected on an expenditure of $31,465.35, the salaries of the three commissioners, their secretary and employees, and traveling and miscellaneous expense.

By its decision on passenger rates, the commission saved about $700,000, based on estimates made by officials of railroads affected.

The most notable decision was the one compelling the Colorado Springs Light, Heat & Power Co. to reduce its rates.

Mr. President, suppose there had been sums exacted by the State of Colorado for water power. Suppose it had exacted, say, $20,000 for a right, the utilities commission would not have had jurisdiction. One of the difficulties of the franchises that are granted by cities is that the corporations enter into a contract to pay what seems a large amount, and then prescribe the amounts which can be charged for electricity or gas for 20 years. That amount is perhaps $50,000. The city needs the $50,000 and grants the franchise for 20 years. Then the cost of generating electricity decreases and the people have to pay $1,000,000 because there was an amount paid to the city; whereas under the utility commission system it has a right, if no contract is made with the city, to demand that the rate shall be reasonable, and thereby the people save $1,000,000 in one year. This is $1,000,000 every year that has been saved by these findings of the Colorado Public Utility Commission. That is the best method of controlling exorbitant rates of corporations. That is the system by which it is being done, and it seems to me that it brings better results than any other.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to proceed when the Senator finishes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. The Senator has spoken of franchises. The Federal Government has no right to grant a water franchise. It has no right to grant a street franchise. It has no right to grant a railroad franchise in the lands of a State. Suppose the Federal Government should attempt to grant a street franchise in the city of Denver, on Sixteenth Street, where the post office is situated, because it owns certain property on that street. There would not be any right there.

Mr. HUSTING. I am not contending that with the Senator at all. I am willing to concede all that he says. What I say is that I do not care whether you call it a franchise or a license; the point I made was that this license is something in the nature of a special privilege, which is given for the development of these streams and in derogation of the property rights of other citizens, and something that all citizens do not enjoy as of a common right. Therefore, the agency receiving such license is the creature of the United States; it is a United States agency; and we can make any contract with it that we desire to make with it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But you can not delegate it with relation to something you do not own. You do not own the water and you can not by some kind of hook or crook——

Mr. HUSTING. I take it for granted that if, as appears in the Chandler-Dunbar case, the United States Government can go and seize the works of a company there and go into the water-power business itself in connection with the navigation business it can delegate that power to private individuals. That is exactly what you are trying to do with your bill. In your bill you recognize that you have something more to say than how this water power shall be developed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The relation of the Federal Government is solely to navigation, and it seems to me that when according to that we get these companies to put millions of dollars into navigation enterprises and then say that we will make it so that you can not make anything out of the enterprises whatever we will make it so that they will not accept, and you will never get any water power developed. Consequently the best way is not to impose these hard restrictions to which the Senator is referring by which they will not do these things, but under the control of the State commission reduce their rates, and when you do that you make the greatest saving for the people.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say, in the first place, in reply, these municipalities can control the right of the regulation even if we exact the money consideration from the licensee or the franchise holder. Its power is not confined to one thing only, but a municipality can charge them so much for the franchise and in addition then say the rate shall be reasonable and the service adequate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. There is no question about that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that there is a law now, and that the terms are so hard that you have not had any development for 8 or 10 years? They will not do it.

Mr. HUSTING. But the Senator draws the inference, I presume, that because of a law on the books no development has been had. As a matter of fact over a million horsepower have been developed in the last three years, since 1912, notwithstanding that law on the books. Besides that, before this law was passed centuries rolled by without any development. Why can the Senator assume that potential power which has been idle and undeveloped for tens of thousands, even millions, of years, and still undeveloped, that one law has held back that development until this time?

It is assumed also that these rates that are under the control of the Public Utility Commission are always adjusted with such fineness that a charge of $25,000 or $50,000 a year will reflect itself in the prices that they charge. It may be a good theory, but it is a theory that rests upon the assumption that the scales of control are so finely balanced and so finally adjusted that the slightest advance in overhead charges is going to raise the rate; and that upon a decrease in the overhead expenses, no matter how slight, the rates will be immediately and promptly lowered.

I can illustrate that that does not obtain in practice. I know of cities where you can buy six street car tickets for a quarter now. You could buy them 25 years ago for the same price, and in the last 15 or 20 years, although the company is getting its hydroelectric power from a power dam that they own somewhere, the public continues to pay the same price, and, with the cheapening of the power, the difference between the old cost of steam power and the water power goes into the company's pockets.

I do not know of any public utility anywhere where it is being regulated down to the bone, and where there is any claim being made that it is being regulated down to 6 or 6½ or 7 per cent. I know that argument is made. I know that argument is made by those who refuse to have their rates reduced by commissions organized for that purpose.

I only refer to this great regulation to which they are being subjected. When it is proposed to raise the tax of the companies, then they say that if you raise their tax they will have to raise their rates; and when it is proposed that their rates shall be reduced, then they of course contest as hard as they can, and are usually successful.

Some mention was made here on the floor the other day of 400 miles of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul track being electrified. That surely represents an enormous saving. Does anybody think that it is going to reduce the passenger fare in the United States or on that road? There has been a raise in freight rates. I presume that the operation is cheapened in a great many ways. Yet, notwithstanding that, in a period of depression the freight rates are raised.

I do not personally agree that it is only the ultimate consumers who pay the tax. If they did, we ought to wipe out all of the taxes imposed on anyone except upon the man in the street, because he has nobody to shove them onto and must pay them anyway. If that theory is correct, why talk of equalization of taxation? If a tax must in the end be paid by the consumer, hand it to him straight and direct and wipe out all intermediate taxes. But why have any intermediate taxes if they are going to be reflected or delegated to some one else to pay? If it is true, as you say, that you pile it on the last man, then do away with all the machinery of taxation and let the laborer pay the whole business. But I do not agree with you on this proposition, for I believe that taxes oftentimes reduce profits and reduce salaries, and that they actually come out of the man who goes to the tax office and pays his taxes, instead of all being piled on the back of the common laboring man. But, coming back to the matter in hand, I say that this question of the power of the United States to develop power in connection with improvement of navigation or to delegate the right or power can not be questioned, in view of the ruling in the Dunbar case. Whatever may be said about the property of the United States in flowing water, whatever may be said of just what their right is, the Supreme Court has held that the Government has absolute jurisdiction of the flowing water of a navigable stream to the extent that no one claiming against it has any property right in it whatever. So it does come down to a matter of right. It does not come down to a matter of property. It comes down to a matter of sovereign power that the United States enjoys and possesses. It may be that you want to waive that power, that you want to surrender that power.

I have heard some of the arguments made by some Senators, who speak as though the United States were a tyrant seeking to impose harsh and unjust measures upon a suffering people. Why not assume that the United States can exercise its power in that direction beneficially for the good of the people and not to their injury? We rule ourselves. Why should anyone feel that in a matter of this tremendous importance what we now have in our hands and under our control that for fear we may use it tyrannically we had better put it into the hands of private interests and trust to their generosity to take care of the public's end of it? That is a very undemocratic doctrine, in my opinion, one that is absolutely out of harmony with the teachings of our party and our Democratic fathers.

Now, if that were our own individual property and we wanted to give it away or throw it away that would be our own particular business. We could do that if we wanted to, and yet I doubt if any man, I do not care who he is, if he had this tremendous power placed in his hands would feel it incumbent upon him to surrender it under the terms and conditions that are being suggested, that the United States should surrender here. Have we any right to surrender power of that kind into private hands and put it under private control? Have we any right on behalf of the people to waive such tremendous resources either upon our own public land or upon our navigable rivers? We do not know and can not know what the future will bring forth. But one thing we must see, and can see, that electric power is something upon which we will be dependent almost exclusively, at least to a great extent, for the development of the country industrially and economically, for it is at the very root of it, the very essence necessary to our industrial development.

If we were going to give power to anyone in this country for the purpose of having him have absolute control and power over the industrial and economic wealth of this country, there is nothing, in my judgment, that you could place in his hands which would give him greater power than by turning over to him the navigable rivers and the navigable waters of the United States, because if he can wield that power, that power which is the very root, the very base of our whole industrial fabric, why, then, he can control the country. We are not running him, then. He is running us, and we have got to do as he says. I say that is too great a power, in my judgment, to put in private hands, to let go without the closest safeguards we can put around it. Whoever holds a license ought never to forget that he holds it as an agent of the State, not as a master of the State; that he has been merely delegated this power, but that that power must be used with due regard for the welfare of the United States and for its people.

There is nothing in this bill which compels anybody to become a public utility. Something has been said here about the control of rates. Well, if any public utility desires to go out of business, I presume it has the right to do so. It can take its power elsewhere and sell it in the market that will give the best price for it. There is nothing in the bill that condemns a public utility to do business as a public utility for all eternity. If it wants to manufacture nitrates or something else which is more profitable it can withdraw this power from the people any time it wants to do so; it can abandon its charter as a public utility, and become a private citizen under this act.

Besides that, another provision in the act gives an individual the power to come in and develop water power and go into private business for himself if he wants to do so. Where will the rates then be regulated, and how will they be regulated? Who will regulate them? I do not know of anybody who can regulate them. I do not know how in any way the Government will have the power to force them to use this power in an industrial way or as a public utility.

There are some other features about the bill, for instance, the recapture clause. The recapture clause, as I understand it——

Mr. NORRIS. That is in section 6, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if he wishes to refer to it.

Mr. HUSTING. I do not know what is the meaning of it, but that is the meaning I read out of it, and if I am wrong I should like to be corrected on that point. It reads:

> SEC. 6. That at any time after the expiration of said 50 years the United States may terminate the right hereinunder granted upon the giving to the grantee of one year's notice in writing of such termination, and upon the taking over by the United States of all the property of the grantee dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power, and upon paying to the grantee the fair value of said property, together with the cost to the grantee of the lock or locks, or other aids to navigation.

I do not know whether it is so intended, but, as I construe that language, if the United States wants to recapture this property, it will have to take everything that is appurtenant to it that in any way is "dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted, which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water."

That language may be construed as it stands there, I think, to mean that as to anything that is dependent in whole or in part on any water power developed, that is connected up in any way, in order to recapture it, you can not take a single unit or a single transmission line, but you will have to take the whole thing. It may be that I am wrong in that, but that is, as I construe it, with the word "are" in the provision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] if it is not his purpose to make some change in the language which is now being referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin at the top of page 10? I thought it was his purpose to make some slight change there in order to clarify the situation.

Mr. SHIELDS. I must confess that I was trying to give attention to another matter, and did not catch the question propounded by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] was making some comments upon the language of the bill at the bottom of page 9 and at the top of page 10—the matter of which I spoke to the Senator with a view to making the purpose of the bill a little more clear—substituting the word "is" for "are," and inserting the word "and."

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I think that if that were done perhaps it would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have the amendment marked on the copy of the bill to be presented later.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Wisconsin will discuss it upon the basis that that change will be made——

Mr. HUSTING. What is the change to be made?

Mr. WALSH. The word "are" is to be changed to "is"; and the word "and" is to be inserted between the words "granted" and "which."

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator whether he construes that to mean that the United States must take the whole transmission line used or connected with any one power that is developed under a license, or how much of the property must the United States take under the Senator's interpretation of this clause?

Mr. SHIELDS. Without any disrespect whatever to the Senator from Wisconsin, I must say that I was giving my attention to another matter and have not the matter which he is discussing in mind. The correction, I think, is largely one of grammatical construction, to correct a grammatical mistake in the bill.

Mr. HUSTING. I will read the language to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I can not well take it up now, for the reason that I have not the Senator's argument in mind.

Mr. HUSTING. Then I shall have to put my own construction on it. In the first place, I still think that, even with that change, it may be construed, or, at least, it is a question whether it can not be construed to mean, that the United States, in order to recapture a property developed under a lease, must not only take the dam and the power site, but must take any property which is dependent, in whole or in part, on that development. That is the language found at the bottom of page 9.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what the changes are which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] suggested? I could not hear them.

Mr. HUSTING. It is proposed, on the first line on page 10, to charge the word "are" to "is."

Mr. NORRIS. What other change is proposed?

Mr. HUSTING. That is all.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, this is rather an important matter that he is canvassing here, because it is all-important how much of this property is going to be taken over. I think it is hardly a fair comment of the Senator from Wisconsin when he says that under the bill "all the property of the grantee" must be taken over which is "dependent, in whole or in part, for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted," because it must also be "property which is valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power."

There might possibly have been a little obscurity by reason of the use of the word "are" instead of the word "is," in line 1, on page 10. Of course the subject of the verb is not "rights," but it is "property," and the subsequent language equally qualifies it.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that change was only to correct a grammatical error. I am delighted to know that the Senator from Tennessee will permit us to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not hear the Senator's remark.

Mr. NORRIS. I say I am delighted to know that we shall get a grammatical error corrected, anyway, in this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. There are quite a number of amendments which the Senator from Tennessee has accepted, and he has never argued against one except when he considered it vitally important to do so. He has allowed the language to be corrected in quite a number of particulars to satisfy Senators and has accepted some corrections by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HUSTING. That was not the matter that I was discussing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It might clarify the situation for the Chair to now understand whether the amendment is to be made changing the word "are" to "is."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the amendment has not yet been offered and I can not offer it now, because there is a pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the RECORD will show that the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. I was not going to discuss that with any particularity, but as it now stands I still think it is obscure. It may be open to question as to just what it means, but I want to go on and merely point out what still remains. The language is that it must take over all the property rights "which are necessary and appurtenant, or acquired and valuable or serviceable in the distribution of water, or in the generation, transmission, and distribution of power."

What does that mean? I should like to call attention to that in connection with another section of the bill relating to preferences for franchises. I can not find it just at this moment, but the bill provides, as I understand, that where there are two applications for a permit or a license the licensee shall receive preference who is best able to carry out the work in that particular region.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin cares to refer to the point in the bill of which he is speaking, he will find it on page 7.

Mr. HUSTING. I thank the Senator. The language there reads:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region.

The Senator from Montana pointed out the significance of that provision. It does not make any difference whether it is a district in a region, in my opinion, or so long as——

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, those lines have been stricken out in pursuance of an amendment which was made a day or two ago.

Mr. HUSTING. How much of the language has been stricken out?

Mr. SHIELDS. I can not recall it, not having the bill before me.

Mr. HUSTING. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, beginning in line 8 with the word "improve," strike out down to and including the word "then," in line 14, and insert "to comply with the conditions imposed herein," so that it will read:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to comply with the conditions imposed herein, preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam to erect which the permit is sought and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed; or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to have the Secretary read once more after the words "preference shall be given to that applicant."

The Secretary read as follows:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States—

And so forth.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I do not understand that. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee to state whether that covers the whole stream. Will the Senator be kind enough to explain the meaning of that? I will say frankly that I do not understand what it means.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not understand the inquiry of the Senator. If there is any explanation I can make or any light I can throw on the provisions of the bill, I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator the meaning of the words "acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise"?

Mr. SHIELDS. Those are the rights that the permittee acquires under State law.

Mr. HUSTING. Rights as a riparian proprietor?

Mr. SHIELDS. Those are partly the rights he might acquire as riparian proprietor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if it will aid the Senator from Wisconsin in understanding it, I will say to him that that language was inserted upon my suggestion to meet the condition of appropriation in the Western States. Two parties are here asking for a permit, each equally qualified. The permit should be given to the one who has first acquired the right to divert the waters of the stream.

Mr. HUSTING. Divert for the purposes of water power or for the purposes of irrigation?

Mr. WALSH. It does not make any difference for what purpose. The man who has diverted water for the purpose of irrigation may change that purpose, if he desires so to do, and use it for power purposes.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, going back to section 6, I desire to repeat that under this act it will be necessary for the Government to take not only the water power and the power house, but, as I understand, to take over the whole transmission line or any part affecting it, or, in the language of the bill, "dependent in whole or in part for its usefulness upon the rights hereunder granted." There are already lines in the country which extend a hundred miles, I presume, and many, perhaps, which extend 50 miles, and no doubt within a short time power will be transmitted, perhaps, over the continent, or, at least, for a great many miles. It will be hooked up with the trolley lines, light stations, and power stations, and I should like to ask any Senator what chance there will be for the United States, under this bill, ever to recapture anything if the United States must take over the whole transportation, light, and power projects?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can not understand why anybody should think that under the language of this bill that would be necessary. This bill does not require that property to be taken over through which the power is used.

Mr. HUSTING. I meant to say the transmission line.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the transmission line has to be taken over. Would the Senator want to have the transmission line separated from the power plant and the power plant sold or turned over at the end of the 50-year period without any transmission line?

Mr. HUSTING. I say no; I do not want them to be separated if it is not necessary to separate them. All that I have stated is that the United States ought not to be required to take them over. It should take them over if it wants to do so, but it ought not to be required to take them over, because I believe that it does not require any great stretch of the imagination for anybody to believe that within a very short time, within a very few years, perhaps, there will be transmission lines ramifying all over a given region or all over a given district, perhaps traversing several States, and in taking over or attempting to take over one unit of power the Government, under this bill, will be absolutely estopped unless it takes all of them over. That is the plain meaning of the bill; and I think it absolutely nullifies the use of or the advantage in the provision which enables the United States to take them over, because if the conditions for taking over are going to be such that the United States under such conditions could never take it over, why, then, that particular provision has little, if any, effect or value, and might just as well be stricken from the bill; and if it is stricken from the bill, then this bill virtually gives a perpetual or indeterminate franchise—practically a perpetual franchise. If the conditions are impossible or unreasonable, then you might just as well give the permittees an indeterminate or perpetual franchise as to impose a condition that no one thinks the United States ever can accept.

I see here grave danger, for if the bill is passed in its present form we will have practically lost control of this power; and it seems to me that we ought not to do that. It seems to me that a bill should be enacted which will fully safeguard the rights of the United States, and which will hold out at least some prospect that at some time the United States will take these powers over and control them itself.

Among other things, it ought to impose a rental charge. The United States, if it is going to do anything with these waterways, must establish reservoir systems on the headwaters of the streams. It does seem to me that the law should provide for compensation from the power users, the power developers, to pay for the improvement of the stream. There is no reason why, if the United States is going into the reservoir business—and I take it that at some time it will have to do so—it should not receive from the water-power owners some part of the expense which it will be put to in developing the reservoirs. Why should not the beneficiaries pay? If reservoirs are established upon the headwaters of the streams by the United States they will improve the water powers of the power users below; and the man who receives this direct and especial benefit ought to be compelled and required to pay money for the improvements which are going directly to benefit him more than anybody else.

So that it seems to me that this amendment should be adopted, and that it is one of the essential things that ought to go into the bill. It does not make any difference how much it is or how little it is, if the principle is put in the bill and the power left in the United States to make readjustments as the requirements of the future may demand. It does not make so much difference how much they pay. It is desirable to have this power developed as soon as possible. The terms ought not to be too harsh to prevent capital from going into the venture; but a small charge, a charge that will give notice to the licensee that the United States expects from time to time to make him help pay for the privilege which he is enjoying should, in my judgment, be provided for in this sort of a bill.

This is a question which has been debated a good deal in the Senate, but I have spoken thus at length in the hope that this matter would not be left out of this bill when it comes to final passage.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel like saying a word with respect to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and lest my position about the matter should be misunderstood I have already announced my adherence to the principle of the first part of this amendment, namely, that there should be a charge made for the privilege extended; but I can not lend my support—and I should not like to be silent when the suggestion is made—that there should be a readjustment of these charges after a period of 20 years and at intervals thereafter of, say, 5 to 10 years. I can not subscribe to the doctrine that that is a wise provision at all. A man who puts his money into such enterprises in the first place wants to know exactly what contribution he will have to make out of his revenues in consideration of the privilege. I feel perfectly satisfied that it would be an undesirable deterrent if he knew that after the lapse of 20 years the charges would be readjusted and fixed at such amount as might at that remote time seem advisable to the man who occupies the position of Secretary of War.

I am very anxious to safeguard the interests of the public in connection with this measure, but I do not want to make its provisions so harsh as to forbid the investment of capital in these enterprises, and I feel certain, as I have said, that this would be an undesirable deterrent.

There is another consideration that ought equally, it seems to me, forbid the adoption of that principle. In the case of many of these powers, Mr. President, it will be impossible to initiate them at all unless contracts can be secured in advance for the consumption of the power, and those contracts will ordinarily be long-time contracts. Take nitrate works, which have been spoken of here. A corporation undertakes to build one of these dams and invests a large amount of capital in one of these great developments. It can get the capital on the strength of a contract which it has with another company, which is quite willing to put up a cyanimide works or other works for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen; but, obviously, no one will put into a manufacturing enterprise of that character the enormous amount of money that is necessary, unless he can be assured of the price at which he is going to get power to operate his works for a long period of time. I should think that he would insist upon a contract of at least 30 years. He would probably have to put out bonds in order to raise the money to make the investment, and those bonds would rarely be for less than 30 years' time. If they were for any less than that, they naturally would have to sell for less upon the market.

Mr. President, if we preserve these powers so that they can be turned over, under reasonable terms and conditions, to the generations that shall come after us 50 years hence, and get a reasonable return to the Government in the meantime, I believe that that is the line along which this legislation ought to progress. I am confident that we shall utterly fail if we align ourselves with the extremists on either side of this question. I do not feel that the bill, as it has been returned by the committee, makes enough concessions—indeed, I do not know that it makes any substantial concessions—to those people who have spoken just now through the Senator from Wisconsin. I think that a median line could be very profitably followed, carrying out the general ideas which I have just announced.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not propose to reargue the questions involved in this amendment. As the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] says, two amendments to the same effect, only less harsh than this, have been rejected by the Senate; and I will not restate the grounds upon which they were opposed. I am willing that a vote should be had.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the amendment now under consideration presents a fundamental question, upon which, as we all know, there is a very wide divergence of opinion among those who have studied the subject involved in this bill. I, for one, can not allow the opportunity to pass without expressing my judgment with regard to it. It is an inquiry to which in times past I have given very considerable study, and I have the most profound conviction with respect to it.

The general principle announced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], and embodied in his amendment, is beyond controversy or dispute; but, in my opinion, the application of the principle to the bill now before the Senate would inflict irreparable injustice upon some communities that will be interested in the development of water power.

I believe that when a municipality comes to grant a franchise for the occupation of its streets or public places to a street railway, or to a gas company, or to a light company, all for service to that community, there ought to be an annual charge for the franchise granted. The charge, going into the treasury of the municipality, will serve to lighten the burden of taxation in that community; and the benefits will be, measurably at least, divided with equity among all the people who are interested.

It is not so with regard to the permission provided for in this bill. I do not concern myself with the matter of constitutional power. I think we have a right to affix any condition we may desire to the permission which is provided for in the bill; and if we thought it was good policy to require a grantee to pay a large sum of money annually or biennially, or in any other way, for the privilege which is granted, then unquestionably we have the constitutional authority to require it. But I am opposed to requiring it, as a matter of policy and justice, for the reason that to compel the payment by a given community, served through a water power that we hope will be created under this bill, is to impose upon that community, for the benefit of the United States, an unjust and unequal burden. It, in effect, compels such a community to bear a measure of taxation which is not imposed upon the people as a whole.

For instance, suppose it were proposed to build a dam in the Ohio River at Cincinnati and the application were before the Secretary of War. Imagine that the Secretary of War believed that a million dollars a year would be a proper charge for the privilege. Assume, further, that the dam is to be built for the purpose of furnishing the people of Cincinnati and vicinity with light or heat or power. The million dollars required by the Secretary of War would be paid into the Treasury of the United States and its benefits would be shared by all the people of the United States. But who would pay it? The people of Cincinnati would pay it. They would pay their other taxes, in common with all the people of the United States, and there would be added to their ordinary burdens the especial burden of paying for this particular privilege.

To me this is glaringly and indefensibly unjust. If the advantages of the million dollars so paid by the people of Cincinnati could be distributed among the people of Cincinnati, my objection would disappear, for it would then rest upon the same basis as though Cincinnati were charging an annual sum for a privilege granted in its streets or public places. But there is no such suggestion as I have just made; and the result is that we are charging the people of Cincinnati this sum for the privilege of putting in the Ohio River a dam that is intended primarily to advance or promote the interests of navigation.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] says that the charge would not be reflected in the rates prescribed by either the municipality or the public-utility corporation which might receive the franchise or permission. It is somewhat speculative, of course, but it can not be true in these days of regulation, in these days of precise definitions with regard to reasonable rates and reasonable practices, that any material charge to the grantee will not find its way into the rates imposed by the grantee, and eventually be paid by the ultimate consumers of the power or the light or whatever may be the product created. If the charge is a merely nominal one, I agree that it would not make its appearance in the rates. But if it is substantial, and if the system of regulation is not an utter failure, it will advance the rates that are charged, no matter whether charged by a municipality, a public-utility corporation, or a user of power for private purposes.

All that I have said is necessarily based upon the view which I take of the subject from another aspect. I believe that the Government of the United States should reserve in its permit the power to regulate the rates charged by the grantee, no matter whether it is engaged in interstate commerce or otherwise. If the grantee is a municipality or a public-utility corporation wholly controlled by the State commission I do not insist that the United States shall exercise this power. But in every other instance, whether the energy is confined within a State or whether it passes beyond the borders of a State, the United States ought to reserve the power to regulate and control the charges that are made by the grantee for the service it renders; and the bill is defective in that respect.

It seems to be assumed that the United States can not exercise this power unless the electrical energy, or some other kind of power, is transmitted from one State to another. I refuse to accept that interpretation of the law.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Maine in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. It is not merely assumed. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that question over and over again.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg to differ from the Senator from California and to suggest that the Supreme Court has never decided any such question, because no such question has ever arisen. The Senator is looking at it, I have no doubt, solely from the standpoint of our constitutional power. I am looking at it just now from the standpoint of our contractual power. We can give or refuse to give to any applicant the right to dam a navigable stream. If we give the applicant the privilege asked, we can, as a condition of the grant, reserve the power to regulate the rates, no matter whether it be within a State or between the States.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator contend that the Government, by a contract with a private individual or a corporation, can set aside the Constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir; I do not. Nor does this bill set aside the Constitution in any way; nor does it infringe upon the Constitution. It has been asserted here over and over again, and, I think, with general assent, that we can impose upon the applicant any condition that may seem to be wise or withhold the grant entirely, and I really feel no doubt of the soundness of my conclusion in that respect. I have mentioned it, however, only as a sort of supplement to the view I have taken of the unwisdom of charging a particular community a sum of money—I assume it will be a substantial sum of money—for the benefit of all the people of the country; and I am assuming, of course, that the rates charged by the grantee, no matter whether it be a municipal corporation or a public-utility corporation or a private corporation, will be fair and reasonable, and that there will be found somewhere, at least, the authority to enforce the regulation or the demand that these rates should be fair and reasonable. But assuming that they are kept at that point, I never have been able to see how the United States could say to these people who are using power in Iowa or in Colorado not generated with the use of public property, not generated with the use of the public lands, but generated in a navigable stream over which our only control arises from the constitutional provision that gives us the power to regulate commerce among the States, that they should pay to all the people of the United States an additional sum for the service that is to be rendered by the grantee. If there were no other way in which the United States could retain its control over the privileges granted under this bill, then the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin would have very great force. But there are other ways in which the control of the United States can be reserved and can be exercised. The ideal conditon must be that if a dam is built in a particular community and power is generated the people of that community shall have the benefit of that power at reasonable prices; and the very moment you make them pay unreasonable prices in order that a sum may be created for the National Treasury you inflict upon them as grave an injustice as I am able to conceive.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Iowa.

I can not exactly agree with the conclusions reached by the Senator from Iowa. In the first place, I do not believe that a charge such as it is contemplated at this time to impose on public utilities would have the slightest effect upon the service of the people of Cincinnati in the instance cited by the Senator. As was argued by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day, they are now paying steam-power rates. A privilege granted by the United States to give them hydroelectric-power service from the flowing waters would enable the public utility to give them the power at a cheaper rate. But would it, as a matter of fact, give them the power at a cheaper rate? Would it not rather make the rate, if it could get a franchise at Cincinnati, just a little bit cheaper than the steam power, and then charge all that the traffic would bear?

There is nothing in this bill to compel a public utility to undersell rates that are reasonable as compared with the cost of steam power. In the instance cited by the Senator there is nothing in this bill to insure the people of Cincinnati cheaper rates merely because they have a hydroelectric-power development. Moreover, speaking from my own experience, at least, in these times of regulation and control I do not know of a single instance where public utilities are being controlled to the limit defined by the Supreme Court as a reasonable return on their investment. I do not know of a single instance. I do not know of an instance where it is claimed that they do that unless it is not a paying institution and can not get enough profit out of its operation not because of conditions imposed but because it has not a profitable business. But where it has a profitable business I do not know of a single instance where the public utilities have their rates regulated to such a degree as to keep them within the 6 or 6½ per cent limit.

For that reason I do not think the imposition of this charge would have the slightest effect on the rates to the public. Moreover, there are others besides public utilities. How are you going to reach those men that are using this power in their private business, in the manufacture of nitrates or in the manufacture of paper or something else? By giving them a license to develop hydroelectric power you are putting in their hands a weapon with which they can put their competitor out of business, if they want to do so, because he is using steam power and they are using water power or hydroelectric power. Their competitor may be a riparian owner on that stream; and yet the newcomer gets a license under this act, seizes his competitor's land, pays him a price as for land, and then develops power and puts his competitor out of business. How are you going to reach him without a charge?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? If they put him out of business, will they not have to reduce the rate in order to do it?

Mr. HUSTING. I am speaking now of a private manufacturing institution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know it. Would they not have to reduce the price of their product in order to put the other party out of business?

Mr. HUSTING. Why, yes; and they can afford to reduce the price of their product if they can manufacture it cheaper than the other man can.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him a question. After they get the other fellow out of business, what is to hinder them from increasing their price?

Mr. SMOOT. The commission.

Mr. HUSTING. There are many ways in which the newcomer can put his competitor out of business if he has it within his power to manufacture goods cheaper than his competitor can; and the reason why he can manufacture goods cheaper than his competitor can is because the United States has put in his hands the weapon with which to do it.

There is another consideration. It does not seem inequitable to me that these men should pay part of the cost of river improvement. We have been reading in the newspapers about Congress making appropriations of $150,000,000 or something like that, $130,000,000 or $120,000,000, every year for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors. I do not know how much of this sum is expended for the improvement of rivers, but they are improving rivers for the benefit of the community. When we are pouring millions or hundreds of thousands of dollars into a river for the purpose of helping the community, why should not that community pay a little something out of the resulting benefit, or help defray to a certain extent the expenses of the Government in taking care of these rivers?

I do not think that is unjust. I do not think it is unreasonable for them to do that and for the United States to require it.

As far as the terms of this readjustment are concerned, it is not material to me whether it is done every 30 years or every 20 years. So far as this provision is concerned, I am willing to make it the first 30 years and then every 10 years thereafter, or the first 40 years and then every 10 years thereafter, or the first 50 years and every 10 years thereafter. That is not the important thing. The important thing is that it will be recognized as a proper thing for the United States to do. When the United States, if it wished to do so, could go in and take this improvement into its own hands, but instead, it sees fit to delegate this privilege to some one else or to some utility, thereby putting in their hands something of tremendous financial value, I can not appreciate the force of the argument that they should not in some way besides a doubtful matter of regulating rates do some practical thing to pay for what they are getting, to pay for what the United States is giving to them by way of this grant or license.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak on this amendment, because upon the vital question involved I have already expressed myself quite fully during the course of the debate on the bill, when other amendments having a similar import were before the Senate; but I listened to the most distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and it seemed to me that what he said ought not to be permitted to go unanswered.

In the first place, as far as this amendment is concerned, it would seem to me better if the Senator from Wisconsin struck out all of it after the word "act" in line 4. I should like to confine this vote to the one principle involved, as to whether in this bill we ought to give authority to the Secretary of War to charge a rental—an annual charge. As I have said, I have gone all over that question, and have given the reasons that to me seem proper why the authority should be given in this bill. It is one of the vital questions and one of the fundamental principles involved in this legislation.

I am not going now to go over the ground that I went over before; at least, not in detail. But to my mind this amendment, leaving out the part of it referring to a readjustment every 10 years, presents to the Senate a fundamental principle; and no law, as I look at it, upon the question of water power is complete without including that principle—that right. We ought to remember, as has well been said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], that we are dealing here with rights that are not ours personally, with rights that do not belong even to the present generation, but that we are giving away rights that belong to generations yet unborn—a heritage, you may say, of the people. It comes from our power over navigable streams, and on that, the legal part of it, I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. We have the right to prevent the building of a dam in a navigable stream, and, having the right to prevent it, we have the right to permit it on any conditions that we may lay down.

The Senator from Iowa falls into the universal error, in my judgment, fallen into by those who opposed the exercise of this right, that any charge which may be made, at least of a substantial nature, by the Secretary of War will be reflected in the price the consumer must pay for the product. That is the universal objection, and at first blush it seems to be valid; and in many cases it would be valid, I concede. Among those who believe in the exercise of this right, in placing it in the law, there are those who say that we ought to exercise this charge even though it is reflected in the price the consumer has to pay. Personally I do not agree with those who take that position. I agree with them that we have the right to do it. I do not believe we ought to make a charge in any case that would be reflected in the price the ultimate consumer has to pay.

This amendment, if agreed to, will be followed by another that will preclude the Secretary of War from making any charge in case a municipality gets the right to construct a dam and generate power under it for the purpose of supplying their inhabitants, or counties, or other subdivisions, or even States. But I can draw a distinction, which seems to me to be perfectly apparent, that many cases will arise where a very substantial charge can be made without that charge being paid by the consumer. Let me take the case the Senator from Iowa gave us as an illustration. He said, suppose we pass this bill and they build a dam across the Ohio River to furnish power to the citizens of Cincinnati. He says, suppose we charge them a million dollars a year for the right to maintain that dam. Now, right there he starts off where I would not go, where those who favor giving the Secretary the power to charge a rental would not go, where no Secretary of War in the proper administration of his office would go. But let us suppose that the Secretary in that case, instead of saying, "I will charge you a million dollars a year," would say to the corporation that for the purpose of supplying electricity to the city he would say, first, I will not give you this right at all if the city of Cincinnati herself wants to get it. She shall have the first chance, and it ought to be in every law, and she ought to have it if she takes it as a municipality to supply her citizens for domestic purposes with electricity and to supply the municipality for the purpose of lighting the streets, the parks, and public buildings, and operating street cars. She ought to have it for nothing, according to my theory.

But in the case the Senator has put the corporation comes along and says to the Secretary, "We want to build a dam across the Ohio River to supply Cincinnati with light and power." The Secretary says to this corporation, "Since Cincinnati herself as a municipality does not want this right, I will give it to you, and I will give it to you on condition that you shall not charge the people of Cincinnati more than a certain price for their electricity, that you shall furnish to the citizens of that city and to the municipality itself electricity at a certain price, and for that I will charge you nothing, or I will make the charge absolutely nominal. If you charge a higher price to the people of Cincinnati, I will charge you a higher price for every unit of power developed."

Suppose, again, that when this corporation comes to the Secretary of War to dam the Ohio River to supply the people in Cincinnati with light and heat and power the Secretary of War found the corporation that was going to dam the river and do that was already supplying the people of Cincinnati with electricity through the use of coal. Suppose he reached the conclusion that this corporation wanted to get this power to dam the river not for the purpose of bringing about the full development but for the purpose in reality of preventing somebody else from getting it and making the development. In other words, that the object was to prevent full development so as to keep up a high price to the consumer.

Then he would say to this corporation, "I will grant you this privilege on condition that all horsepower will be developed that can be developed at that power plant from the plans and specifications and the reports of the engineers, and if you develop it all and sell it as I have heretofore said I will charge you only a nominal price. If you develop only half of it, I will charge a higher price."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska certainly did not understand me to oppose any such power or authority as he has just been describing.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I did; but——

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be willing to invest the Secretary of War with any such power as that. My whole argument was that the service, whatever it might be, of a public character over which the public had control and the power of regulation was to see to it that the service was rendered at a reasonable price, that the charges would not be unjust. If we take the case of a private corporation in which the price is fixed by competition instead of regulation, not a word I said would apply to any such case as that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's argument, as I understood it, was based entirely upon the theory that if any substantial charge was made the consumer had to pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not agree to that at all. There may be cases——

Mr. CUMMINS. We may differ about that, but I want the Senator from Nebraska to have clearly in his mind the distinction I make between the service that is under public control, where some governmental body has the authority to determine what price shall be put upon the service and the cases in which the service is controlled by the ordinary laws of business or what we call competition. I tried to make that clear by saying that I thought we had the power, if we wanted to exercise it, through the contract to fix the rate even of the private corporation, but we do not propose to do that in this bill. Therefore I entirely agree with the Senator from Nebraska with regard to the propriety of charging a corporation for pecuniary profit whose service or commodity or article, whatever it may be, is not controlled by the Government in one or the other of these aspects. It ought to pay. There is no question about that in my mind.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, I want to say to the Senator I do not wish to charge in any case where the consumer has to pay. I do not want to make a charge for the development of power in a navigable stream where the consumer pays. I am in favor of giving the Secretary the right to make an annual charge on the horsepower developed for one reason—and it is not the only reason—because it is a regulatory power, and the illustration, taking the Senator's own illustration, I think, demonstrates that by giving him this power he can regulate and prevent monopoly and prevent extortion.

It is said by those who oppose it, and it was said by the Senator from Iowa, that he would let the Secretary or the Federal authority regulate even the price wherever there was not a State board that had the power to regulate it. It is said by others that we can safely surrender Federal authority, because the State commission will regulate it. As I have often said before, I am not finding fault with State utility commissions. They have done a great deal of good and are doing a great deal of good, but they are not one-half as effective as the Federal Government would be if the Secretary of War had the right to charge, and in exercising that right would make a charge or a rental that would regulate the price the consumer had to pay in the way that I have illustrated in Cincinnati. There is not any court that could interfere with that; there is not any delay that would come about from that; but let the State regulate it, good as the are and as much as they have accomplished, they have accomplished comparatively little compared to what there is to accomplish. The difficulty is that they do not regulate in all cases, and that they regulate, where they regulate, is at the end of a lawsuit.

Mr. President, quite a number of years ago Congress passed a law fixing a maximum amount that could be charged by a telephone company for telephone service. What happened to it? The telephone companies paid no attention to it. Some man refused to pay, and he depended on that act. They went to court and had a lawsuit, and when they got through with that lawsuit it was taken on an appeal to the higher court of the District, and after waiting a while there it was decided, and then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and after waiting there for a year or so it was decided there, reversed, sent back to the first court for trial, and that court tried it over again and it went on up again. I do not know how far it got the next time; I have forgotten the entire history of it; but years and years went by, and I have forgotten whether the poor fellow who was sued by the telephone company lived to see the end of the lawsuit, but if he did live to see the end of it he lived to see the time when he had no money to fight it any further, and it was a good deal cheaper to pay.

That law is on the statute books to-day, unrepealed absolutely. The last court that decided it—I think it was one of the lower courts—held that the act was not good. I think it was the original court where the suit commenced. It held that the act was not good. There is an illustration of delay that comes about if it is possible for a court to get a chance at regulation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator right there, if that does not show the inefficiency of Federal control as contrasted with State control where they do get relief?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it does not. Suppose the Secretary of War fixed it, who would sue the Government? He possessing this right, representing the United States, who would sue him? Who would sue Uncle Sam? They would turn it right out at the beginning. His right, whatever he said, would be put into force to begin with, and if he did get into any litigation he could afford to fight it to the end instead of wearing out somebody who could not afford to fight it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator if you are going to give this power to the Secretary without any right of the court to attempt to come in and have these matters tested, what company on earth would ever undertake the improvement of the navigation of a stream?

Mr. NORRIS. Plenty of them. There is a great deal of difference between a corporation fighting the Secretary of War and fighting an individual. He is able to cope with them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But they never would put their heads into such a trap, and consequently you would never get your navigation improved.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to fix it so there will be no trap. If you leave this bill as it is their heads and bodies are in a trap. There is not anything outside of the trap. There is nothing to it but a trap. It is all trap.

Mr. President, we passed a law here quite a number of years ago creating a commission to regulate street cars, gas companies, telephone companies in the District of Columbia, and they have been drawing a salary and doing work, some good work, perhaps, ever since. They have not yet done many things of very great importance to the people of this city and District, but I understand they have been making investigations and spending a good deal of money, and doing it probably in a scientific way, and that they are about ready to have something to say about universal transfers, for instance, or about the price of gas, or the telephone, or electricity. What will happen when they do say it? This is what will happen, or very likely it will happen: The company that is affected will get an injunction restraining them from putting their order into force, and they will go through the courts, up and down the regular stairway from the Supreme Court down and from the lower court up to the Supreme Court, and when they get through they will get a judgment. Suppose the order is affirmed in the end by the Supreme Court of the United States? How many years will it be before that is brought about from the time we passed the law giving that commission the authority to do this? About four years have passed now, it may be five, and by the time we get through, with the many times that the Supreme Court may reverse the case, it will be about the life of an ordinary individual between the passage of the law and the relief that finally comes to the people at the other end of the string.

If we had the power at the beginning of the operations, right when the contract by which the Secretary of War could collect an annual charge, by which he could regulate it, we would get regulation from the beginning, and we would get something that is effective; get it at once without delay, and it would be permanent.

Let me take another illustration now. I have followed out the illustration given by the Senator from Iowa. Suppose another corporation want to dam the Ohio River at some other point, to go into the manufacture of paper, and they get the right under this bill, and it is passed without the amendment as it is now before the Senate, just as it has been drawn by the committee, and that paper mill is established. It comes in open competition with another paper mill. The other paper mill may not be so favorably situated. They may get their power from steam or even from some water power that does not have the advantages that this is going to get. The other paper mills, with which it comes in competition, produce their power at a cost, let us say, of $50 per horsepower, and they develop a power under this bill and produce their power at $40 a horsepower. In the first place, will they sell their product to the consumer, taking only a reasonable profit above what it costs them to produce their power? Would the Senator from Iowa do it? Would I do it? Why, no; we would charge all the market would stand; everybody would do that; they would have a right to do so under the law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. In just one moment I will yield. I am not through with the illustration. Let me finish this, and then I will yield to the Senator.

Suppose the amendment is put in; suppose we pass a law that provides that the Secretary of War shall have the right to charge a rental price for the power developed, and he says to these people, "I am going to charge you $5 a horsepower." That is a very high price, probably higher than ever would be charged for such power, and yet that still leaves a difference in favor of the company organized under this bill of $5 a horsepower, in competition with those manufacturing paper sold on the same market. They pay that to the Treasury of the United States. The consumer would not be affected one way or the other. They could still undersell their competitor, but the people of the United States, who are the owners of this right and who have given these privileges, would get some compensation for the privileges they had bestowed.

Just a little further. Where is the State-regulating power that is going to come in there? There is not any public-utility commission in any State that has power to say what price the paper manufacturers shall put upon their output, or, if they were manufacturing nitrate, there is not any public-utility commission that could say what their charges should be. If they were making flour, as hundreds and hundreds of mills on the various streams of the United States are now doing, no public-utility commission could tell them, or would have any authority to tell them, how much they must charge for flour. There are cases like that, where the Secretary of War, if he had the authority, ought to make a substantial charge, always leaving it so low, however, that the man or the corporation could still do business, even getting the power with the charge added at a lower rate than competitors paid for theirs. If he did not have this power, if the bill is left as it is, nothing of that kind can occur.

Suppose we had another corporation organized down on the Ohio River, or on some other river, and they should develop power and sell it, as would often be the case, not directly to the consumer but to some other corporation. The same men would organize various kinds of corporations; one would be to build a dam; another would be to build the transmission lines to the place where they were going to distribute the power; and then they would lease that transmission line to another corporation, and that corporation would sell the electricity to another corporation, and that corporation would distribute it. In the meantime it might go over four or five State lines. If it finally got into Cincinnati the public-utility commission that regulated the price that should be charged in Cincinnati could only do one thing: They would have to permit that corporation distributing the power to have credit for whatever they had to pay, even though they had oiled the machinery of half a dozen corporations between them and the corporation which originally produced the electricity.

It all reduces itself to this, as I look at it: Nobody wants to have the Secretary of War, if he has this authority, tyrannize over anybody; nobody wants him to charge a price that will ruin anyone or that will prevent development. There are many cases where he ought not to charge anything but a nominal price; there are many cases where he ought to charge a substantial price.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Utah in a moment; I have not forgotten him. I want to read, while I am on that point, a portion of what I read before when I was discussing this same subject—a statement issued by Franklin K. Lane, the present Secretary of the Interior. I will not read all he said, for I realize that to some extent what I have said is a repetition of what I have previously said; but it seemed to me that I was justified in doing so, because the argument on the other side was likewise repetition of what had before been stated, although coming from a different source this time. Mr. Lane said:

> We should charge nothing at first, during the period while the plant is building and finding a market, except, perhaps, a charge merely sufficient to pay the expenses of administration. This period of nominal charge might be 5 or 10 years. The charge should then gradually and moderately increase as the years go by according to a scale fixed in the lease or permit at the outset, and in every instance premium should be put on low rates to the consumer. The lower the rate to the consumer, the lower should be the rate to the grantee.

So one of the principal objects of those who agree with me on this proposition of having such a power placed in the hands of whatever officer is going to represent the Federal Government is to regulate. Although there are regulating commissions in practically every State in the Union, they have many difficulties to contend with; they have some difficulties much more serious than the Secretary of War would have. If the Secretary of War had this authority, and a regulating body in a State where the electricity was finally used had under its jurisdiction all the parties necessary to control it, and did control it and regulate it properly, there would not be any conflict; there would not be any difficulty, because all the Secretary of War would want to do with his power of regulation would be to see that nothing unfair was done against the consumer; that no monopoly was brought about; and that the rates were fair and honest. Now, I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was simply going to say to the Senator from Nebraska, that his illustration is impracticable. It is well understood to-day that, for a small power development, it can be made with a modern steam engine cheaper than it is possible to develop a small unit of power by water. In order to put a hydroelectric plant in operation to create power to compete with steam, it has to be in large units. That is conceded by everybody.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, it is not conceded in all cases by me.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, Mr. President, that there is not an instance anywhere where a man can go to a stream of water, put in a dam, a generating plant, and run and maintain that plant for the sole purpose of operating a paper mill or a gristmill. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. Right there I want to tell the Senator from Utah, when he says that there is not any such instance, that there are hundreds of such instances. I myself happen to have had an interest in just that kind of a gristmill. I can go out, even in my section of country, where we do not have very much water power, and point the Senator to dozens, yes, to hundreds of instances of that very kind. There is not any doubt about it whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. How long is the transmission line, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. There is no transmission line by the gristmill. You build your mill, construct your mill race, and get your power there. Then you grind your wheat and make your flour.

Mr. SMOOT. If you have a mill race and have water running through it, why on earth does not your water wheel furnish the power direct, instead of using your water wheel for generating electricity and transmitting power to the mill?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Utah does not understand what I am trying to tell him. There is not any electricity about the gristmill.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, then, the Senator is pointing to a case to which I did not refer at all.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator might not have had it in his mind, but it was included in what he said. He said there was not an instance——

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, I said that there was not an instance—I will repeat it—the Senator can not point to where there is a dam constructed in a stream and a hydroelectric plant is established there——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator never said that before.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think I did.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I accept it that way.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Reporter to read what I said.

Mr. NORRIS. I will assume that the Senator did say it. He can say it now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Reporter to read just exactly what I did say.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; if the Senator wants to take up time I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not taking up time.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is not doing anything but taking up time. He does not want to deny that, does he?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I say——

Mr. NORRIS. Then, let us have the Reporter read what the Senator said.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no intention whatever of taking up time. I simply rose to tell the Senator that his illustration was not an apt one nor was it practicable.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, my illustration was a gristmill.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator now that no paper mill could afford to establish a hydroelectric plant and transfer the power over wires to its mill in any such quantity as would be necessary to run its plant.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the paper mill does not need to transport its electricity. It can do as the gristmill does. The paper mill can be built right where the power exists.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but, Mr. President, then the mill will be run by water power, not electric power.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly, it will be run by water power.

Mr. SMOOT. This bill has nothing whatever to do with cases like that.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill applies to every case of that kind, if it is on a navigable stream.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill provides for the development of hydroelectric power, and it does not affect the water that runs a water wheel which furnishes the power for a mill.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not read the bill, Mr. President. He certainly has been asleep during all these days of debate. It has been referred to over and over and over again. Some have advocated it because they wanted to manufacture nitrate, and they have given illustrations of paper mills and of flour mills and of other kinds of power mills.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course if nitrate is to be manufactured from the air, as the Senator knows, in order to manufacture it from that element and from the other elements, such as limestone and other necessary ingredients, immense power is required, and it has got to be electric power. No water wheel can run the plant that makes nitrate. You must have electric power in order to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, there is just as much nitrate in the atmosphere down on the banks of a river that is navigable as there is in the atmosphere a thousand miles away.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is absolutely true.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not have to conduct electricity across the country in order to manufacture nitrates.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. And he can not make nitrates unless he has a water wheel.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, it is absolutely useless to try to argue with a person when he pays no attention to the subject matter of which you are speaking, but goes entirely off on something else. So I shall say nothing more.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, Mr. President. It is a difficult thing to argue with that kind of a person; but it is still more difficult for a person to argue when he is talking about something that he does not know anything about, and about a bill which he probably never has read, from what he says here. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, since the Senator knows so much about electricity, its transmission, and knows all about the bill and about everything connected with it, I want to ask him can nitrates be manufactured from the air without electric power?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, who has said they could?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, the Senator has.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he has not. I have said that you did not have to transfer your electricity over a thousand miles of transmission lines to do that. You can have it all done on the bank of a little creek if it has sufficient power.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say to the Senator that he can run the gristmill in which he is interested with power direct from a water wheel, and no electricity need be generated. This is not the case in the manufacturing of nitrates from the air.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, who said it was? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not say anything of the kind. That only illustrates that the Senator does not only not know anything about this bill, but it illustrates the fact that his hearing is failing. He can not distinguish the English language when a man with a moderate voice like mine speaks to him. The Senator from Nebraska never intimated such a thing, never claimed it, nor does he know of anybody who has ever claimed it, here or elsewhere.

Mr. HUSTING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield presently. The Senator from Utah arose to call my attention to what he believed to be a fact, that there is nothing in this bill that would permit anybody to get a right under it to make flour or to make paper.

Mr. SMOOT. I never said that.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Senator again has forgotten what he said. He said that there was not anything in the bill that applied to a gristmill; in other words, when I cited a gristmill I was giving an illustration that was not apt, as the Senator said. Now, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Utah to say that this bill provided purely for the development of hydroelectric power.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is what the Senator from Utah said, but he has forgotten it by this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUSTING. I want to call the attention of the Senator to section 1 of the bill, which states:

> That the United States hereby authorizes any of the persons as hereinafter defined, after obtaining the permit of the Secretary of War as hereinafter provided, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam or dams or diversion structures and accessory works for the development and improvement of navigation and for water power or other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, those who object now to a charge being imposed are led into the error that those of us who favor a charge want a charge of such material size as must necessarily be reflected in the cost to the consumer. I have always admitted, and I admit now, that a charge could be made that would be so great that it would be necessary for the man or corporation who paid it to charge more for the output.

I am in favor of giving the Secretary the power to make this charge principally for two reasons: First, where, in cases like I have illustrated, the grantee is able to make his product at so much less cost than his competitor and goes into a business that is not and can not be regulated, the charge there ought to be of a material size, so as to bring in a revenue to the Government. The other reason is because the right to make this charge can be used and ought to be used by the power representing the Federal Government to regulate the product and protect the consumer and at the same time prevent monopoly and compel full development of the resource.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think that the regulating power of the State ought to be there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I have no objection, as I said, to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then the Senator desires that there should be a regulating power in the Secretary of War, and, in addition to that, a regulating power in the State government?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not found any fault with the regulating power in the State government. I have gone over the matter several times; but has the Senator, in his State, a public-service commission that can fix the price that a manufacturer of flour can charge for the product?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no. You have got to rely upon competition in those matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; exactly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what you have got to do. But does not the Senator recognize the fact that, if you have a regulating power at the National Capital and a regulating power in the State, there is no company on earth that will ever put itself in the position of undertaking this work, and therefore you will have no development whatever?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, Senators have been talking about the great development in Canada. Does the Senator know that the various Provinces of Canada all charge a rental fee to the grantee?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but the utility companies of the Provinces——

Mr. NORRIS. And they have public-utility commissions in Canada. The point I wanted to make to the Senator was that those who are behind this bill have given illustrations of the wonderful development that has taken place in Canada, and yet Canada has provisions in her law by which a rental is charged, just as we desire to amend this bill. If it works so well in Canada, why will it bring such ruin here?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, is there any regulating power in the Canadian Government itself—that is, the central government—as to these matters? My understanding is that it is all in the Provinces.

Mr. NORRIS. The Province owns the land.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; the Province owns the land.

Mr. NORRIS. It is like Texas in this country; but the Province charges a rental for the horsepower developed in nearly every one of the Canadian Provinces. Now, the Province has the right in Canada, just as the Federal Government has the right here, to control the navigable streams, and having that power, it charges a rental fee upon the power developed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator, then, takes the position that there should be a rental charge, and in addition to that the Secretary of War should control the rates, and in addition to that the utility commissions of the States should regulate the rates. I say to the Senator, with all due respect, that I do not believe any company would undertake to build for the United States, and spend millions of dollars to construct, a dam for the purpose of improving navigation.

Mr. NORRIS. That is just what the public-utility corporations have done in many foreign countries, and are doing right now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me first answer the Senator from Colorado, and then I will yield to the Senator from Alabama.

I have been over this matter two or three times with the Senator from Colorado, and I do not suppose there is any profit in our going over it again. We disagree fundamentally. I have given a good many illustrations here where the public-utility commission, while it does a great deal of good, is not as effective as the Secretary of War would be. I have given illustrations of where public-utility commissions have started in and have been four or five years in traveling their weary way from one court to another before they finally got the question adjudicated and a final decision made, wearing each other out. This regulation is at the head. If the Secretary of War is given the authority in this bill, he can, as Secretary Lane has so well outlined in what I read from him, use it as a power of regulation to prevent extortion, to prevent monopoly, and to assure the full development of any particular power site.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Iowa have had a good deal to say about the building of a dam at Cincinnati, on the Ohio River, for the development of power. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he believes that a power dam can be constructed on the Ohio River anywhere between Pittsburgh and the Mississippi River, with the single exception of the falls at Louisville?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. NORRIS. We were using it only as an illustration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I supposed the Senator knew all about it.

Mr. NORRIS. I used that illustration because the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] used it. I took the same illustration that he used. I do not suppose the Senator from Iowa has any knowledge about whether or not, right at Cincinnati, there are any power possibilities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I simply asked the question to emphasize the fact that the amount of water power in this country is so much exaggerated that it is almost impossible to get a fair consideration of this bill. There are no water powers on the Ohio River, for obvious reasons, excepting, perhaps, at the falls at Louisville. There are no powers on any navigable river in this country where there are no falls or shoals or high banks. Every engineer in the country can tell you that. Yet we are discussing this bill upon the idea that every river in this country is a great water-power site, and every branch and every other place where water runs at all could develop a great power to fix nitrogen from the air, and all that sort of thing.

I do hope the Members of the Senate in discussing this bill will keep in view, if they can, the fact that it has no application whatever, and can have no application whatever, to a river that is navigable or supposed to be navigable, and is under the direction and control of the Government through the agency of the Secretary of War.

I believe that is one of our troubles, Mr. President. We are discussing this bill from the standpoint that everywhere there is a navigable stream there is a power site. There never was a greater mistake in the world than that. I may say to the Senate that there are only a few places in this country where great powers can be developed. Of course you can develop power with a turbine wheel or an old-fashioned ram's-horn wheel, as they used to call it when I was a boy, by applying the water directly to the wheel and turning a gristmill, or with an overshot wheel somewhere where you can put the water directly on the wheel and turn a flour mill or some other mill that requires a small amount of power. But the pending bill, which we have been discussing for 15 or 20 days, has no application whatever to situations like that. It seems to me that in discussing this bill the Members of the Senate might be willing now, after 10 or 15 days of discussion, to confine themselves to the merits of the bill and what the bill itself proposes to accomplish.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama would practice what he preaches, he would not have said a word of his interruption, because he has not offered a single sentence that has any bearing on the question that is now before the Senate. Interesting as his talk was, it has not anything to do with the motion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The trouble is that I can furnish the Senator information, but I can not give him intelligence. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that the Senator can, but it is difficult to give what you do not possess. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. President, if the Senator's theory is right, then a man is committing a sin if he uses an illustration here in the Senate to illustrate a point; and the Senator from Iowa is the one who was originally guilty, because he said, "Suppose we give a right to build a dam across the Ohio River at Cincinnati." Now, the Senator from Alabama comes in and says, "Why, you could not build a dam there, because there are no falls there," and he wants us to remember that there are very few places where power can be developed.

Why, nobody has been claiming in this discussion, on this amendment, at least, anything about the great possibilities of power development in this country. If we only have a few sites left, then that is all the more reason why we ought to protect them for our people. We ought to guard them all the more jealously. But in discussing a question I take it that a Senator can, without any impropriety, use an illustration, as the Senator from Iowa did. I gave several illustrations about building gristmills and about building paper mills, but, of course, I do not intend to build a gristmill; I do not intend to construct a paper mill. I could not if I wanted to. I have not the money, in the first place, and I would not know how to do it if I had it, and, even if I had the money and knew how to do it, I would not do it.

Mr. President, the question involved in the amendment that I have been discussing, and to which I have confined myself when I have not been diverted by somebody else, is whether or not we ought to give to the Secretary of War, on behalf of the Government, the right to make a reasonable charge for the power developed, for the privileges granted. I have been trying as best I could to show that we ought to do that, first, in some instances, as I have illustrated, because it would bring money into the Treasury of the United States, and, secondly, because it could be used by the Secretary as a regulatory measure and would redound to the benefit of the consumer in the end.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is the Senator going to move to take a recess?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Before he does that I want to have an amendment printed. I wish to offer an amendment to this bill providing for the development of power by the Government of the United States at the Great Falls of the Potomac. I send to the desk the amendment, and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Washington was in the Chamber or not; but as long as we are recessing from day to day it is thought best that no morning business shall be done, and there has been objection for the last two days to all morning business. Therefore, under that arrangement, I shall have to object to the submission of this report.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, did the Senator say 11 o'clock?

Mr. SHIELDS. Eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator that I have some committee work to-morrow that I should like very much to attend to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fletcher	Hughes	Lane
Brandegee	Gallinger	Husting	Lee, Md.
Chilton	Gore	Johnson, Me.	Martin, Va.
Cummins	Hitchcock	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martine, N. J.
du Pont	Hollis	Kern	Myers

Nelson	Robinson	Simmons	Tillman
Overman	Shafroth	Smith, Ga.	Walsh
Page	Sheppard	Smoot	Warren
Poindexter	Shields	Swanson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. KERN. I suggest that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the list of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ASHURST, Mr. REED, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. STERLING, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LEWIS. I think that gives us a quorum.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move to vacate the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the President of the United States at the Gridiron dinner last Saturday night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

"Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen, I have very little to say tonight except to express my warm appreciation of the invariable courtesy of this club and of the reception you have so generously accorded me. I find that I am seldom tempted to say anything nowadays unless somebody starts something, and tonight nobody has started anything.

"Your talk, Mr. Toastmaster, has been a great deal about candidacy for the Presidency. It is not a new feeling on my part, but one which I entertain with a greater intensity than formerly, that a man who seeks the Presidency of the United States for anything that it will bring to him is an audacious fool. The responsibilities of the office ought to sober a man even before he approaches it. One of the difficulties of the office seldom appreciated, I dare say, is that it is very difficult to think while so many people are talking, and particularly while so many people are talking in a way that obscures counsel and is entirely off the point.

"The point in national affairs, gentlemen, never lies along the lines of expediency. It always rests in the field of principle. The United States was not founded upon any principle of expediency; it was founded upon a profound principle of human liberty and of humanity, and whenever it bases its policy upon any other foundations than those it builds on the sand and not upon solid rock. It seems to me that the most enlightening thing a man can do is suggested by something which the Vice President said to-night. He complained that he found men who, when their attention was called to the signs of spring, did not see the blue heaven, did not see the movement of the free clouds, did not think of the great spaces of the quiet continent, but thought only of some immediate and pressing piece of business. It seems to me that if you do not think of the things that lie beyond and away from and disconnected from this scene in which we attempt to think and conclude, you will inevitably be led astray. I would a great deal rather know what they are talking about around quiet firesides all over this country than what they are talking about in the cloakrooms of Congress. I would a great deal rather know what the men on the trains and by the wayside and in the shops and on the farms are thinking about and yearning for than hear any of the vociferous proclamations of policy which it is so easy to hear and so easy to read by picking up any scrap of printed paper. There is only one way to hear these things, and that is constantly to go back to the fountains of American action. Those fountains are not to be found in any recently discovered sources.

"Senator HARDING was saying just now that we ought to try when we are a hundred million strong to act in the same simplicity of principle that our forefathers acted in when we were 3,000,000 strong. I heard somebody say—I do not know the exact statistics—that the present population of the United States is 103,000,000. If there are 3,000,000 thinking the same things that that original 3,000,000 thought, the 100,000,000 will be saved for an illustrious future. They were ready to stake everything for an idea, and that idea was not expediency, but justice. And the infinite difficulty of public affairs, gentlemen, is not to discover the signs of the heavens and the directions of the wind, but to square the things you do by the not simple but complicated standards of justice. Justice has nothing to do with expediency. Justice has nothing to do with any temporary standard whatever. It is rooted and grounded in the fundamental instincts of humanity.

"America ought to keep out of this war. She ought to keep out of this war at the sacrifice of everything except this single thing upon which her character and history are founded, her sense of humanity and justice. If she sacrifices that, she has ceased to be America; she has ceased to entertain and to love the traditions which have made us proud to be Americans; and when we go about seeking safety at the expense of humanity, then I, for one, will believe that I have always been mistaken in what I have conceived to be the spirit of American history.

"You never can tell your direction except by long measurements. You can not establish a line by two posts; you have got to have three at least to know whether they are straight with anything, and the longer your line the more certain your measurement. There is only one way in which to determine how the future of the United States is going to be projected, and that is by looking back and seeing which way the lines ran which led up to the present moment of power and of opportunity. There is no doubt about that. There is no question what the roll of honor in America is. The roll of honor consists of the names of men who have squared their conduct by ideals of duty. There is no one else upon the roster; there is no one else whose name we care to remember when we measure things upon a national scale. And I wish that whenever an impulse of impatience comes upon us, whenever an impulse to settle a thing some short way tempts us, we might close the door and take down some old stories of what American idealists and statesmen did in the past, and not let any counsel in that does not sound in the authentic voice of American tradition. Then we shall be certain what the lines of the future are, because we shall know we are steering by the lines of the past. We shall know that no temporary convenience, no temporary expediency will lead us either to be rash or to be cowardly. I would be just as much ashamed to be rash as I would to be a coward. Valor is self-respecting. Valor is circumspect. Valor strikes only when it is right to strike. Valor withholds itself from all small implications and entanglements and waits for the great opportunity when the sword will flash as if it carried the light of heaven upon its blade."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OWEN. I present a resolution adopted by the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, in extraordinary session assembled, favoring the passage of the so-called Hastings bill, placing the affairs of certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes under the supervision of the Union Agency at Muskogee, Okla. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Engrossed senate resolution No. 8. (By Fields.)

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States a measure known as the Hastings bill, which has for its purpose the removal of a portion of the Bureau of Indian Affairs from Washington, D. C., and placing the affairs of certain members of the Five Civilized Tribes under the supervision of the Union Agency at Muskogee, Okla.; and

Whereas by so doing the "red-tape" methods which have been in vogue since the early days of such Indian tribes in Oklahoma will be eliminated, and thus relieve all concerned of the unnecessary burdens which are so eminently in evidence in long-range government; and

Whereas Oklahoma stands to-day in the foremost ranks of the States of the American Union in advancement, and has just cause to expect encouragement and assistance from the Federal Government in affairs over which control is retained and exercised: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma in extraordinary session assembled, That we earnestly memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact into law the Hastings bill, and thus remove the obstacles that surround certain property rights in Oklahoma, in order that the material advancement of the State be not retarded and that the betterment of this class of citizens be brought about.

Passed by the senate February 19, 1916.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in section 12 of the Post Office bill as it passed the House yesterday it provides that the act of March 4, and so forth, be amended to read as follows. The first "to" is superfluous. It would be section 11 of the bill as it has been passed by the House. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution authorizing and ratifying the action of the enrolling clerk in leaving out that word "to."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 151.

Resolved, That the action of the Enrolling Clerk in leaving out the first word "to" in the fourth line of section 11 of the bill, H. R. 10484, in engrossing said bill, is hereby authorized and ratified.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill it is not my purpose to engage in a general discussion as to its details. It is my purpose only to discuss some of the general features of the bill and to reserve a discussion of the details until the bill is considered under the five-minute rule, when it can be discussed more satisfactorily and properly.

I think it proper to say that the committee having charge of this bill has given to it very careful consideration. Hearings were conducted extensively, covering a period of four or five weeks, and while the bill may not in all of its aspects please every individual Member, I believe that upon a careful analysis of it the House will find that it is a fair bill, fair to those who work for the Government, and that it was prepared with due regard to the interests of the Government, and to the taxpayers who pay the bills.

The estimates upon which this bill is based amounted in all to $40,230,887.25. The total appropriations made for the current fiscal year 1916 amount to $37,036,164.75, which sum includes $131,365, carried in deficiency and other appropriation acts for 1916 for various branches of the public service, that are taken up in the pending bill.

The bill reported appropriates $37,601,539.25, and provides for 15,720 specific salaries. Compared with the appropriations for the current year 1916, and with the estimates submitted to Congress for the ensuing fiscal year 1917, the following differences are shown:

The bill appropriates $565,374.50 more than was appropriated for the same service for the fiscal year 1916. It appropriates $2,629,348 less than was submitted to Congress in the estimates of the executive departments. It provides for 31 fewer specific salaries than were appropriated for this year and 409 less than are specifically called for in the estimates.

The principal increases in this bill over the current appropriations are as follows:

Expenses of collecting the income tax	$380,000
Additional force in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on account of income-tax work	24,800
Additional clerical force in the State Department necessitated by war conditions in Europe	54,080
Clerical force for the Office of Naval Operations, which office was created by the last naval appropriation act	26,350
Additional examiners and other employees in the Patent Office authorized at this session of Congress	52,650

For promotion and development of foreign and domestic commerce, including commerce with Central and South America	$75,000
For additional inspectors for the Steamboat-Inspection Service	52,500
For additional inquiries and investigations by the Bureau of Standards	25,000

Your committee thought, in view of the work performed by the Internal Revenue Commissioner's office during the past year and the work that would necessarily have to be performed by that office during the next fiscal year, that some increase should be given that office for that work. It appears that during the last two years and eight months the Internal Revenue Commissioner has collected and paid into the Treasury about $15,000,000, which has been uncovered by the agents and inspectors and other field employees of that office. Of that amount there has been collected from corporations the sum of $6,987,584.37 and from individuals the sum of $3,128,863.72. It is proper to say that no one contends that any of these corporations or individuals have purposely evaded the payment of their taxes, but you gentlemen, of course, know that the law is comparatively a new one, and there has been a great deal of uncertainty existing among those in charge of the corporations and also among individuals as to exactly what credits or deductions they were entitled to. And it is the opinion of the Internal Revenue Commissioner that these delinquencies have resulted from this uncertainty rather than from any intention on the part of any of these individuals or corporations to evade the payment of the tax justly due by them under the income-tax law.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has stated that he believes it would be possible to collect at least $5 additional tax for every dollar that may be allowed. Investigations are now being made in the field of the books of certain corporations and individuals, where it appeared from the reports submitted to the office here that there has been some mistake made, and that they have charged up too much by way of depreciation and things of that sort. And it has been found that of the number which have been investigated, 63 per cent of the corporations and, singular to say, exactly 63 per cent of the individuals who have been investigated, have been found to be delinquent in the payment of their income tax, resulting, as I stated, from these two sources alone, of more than $10,000,000, which has been paid into the National Treasury. This is a magnificent showing, and one in which the present very able and zealous Internal Revenue Commissioner and his able assistants may justly take great pride.

A greater amount was asked for the Internal Revenue Service, but the committee, after careful consideration, felt that the sum allowed would possibly be sufficient; or, if not, and it appeared to the next Congress that a greater amount was necessary, it would be possible for the department to come to Congress and secure it if a proper showing was made. It is evident, of course, that as time goes on and as these corporations and individuals become more familiar with the law and with their rights in regard to depreciation and deduction there will be a less amount found to be delinquent.

The committee also allowed an extra force in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, consisting of 20 clerks, amounting in salaries to $24,800 during the entire year, and this appropriation was made in order to take care of the business now in the office and the extra work which it is presumed this extra appropriation will require.

The bill also allows an increase in the clerical force of the State Department, amounting to $54,080, and which consists of 42 additional employees, practically all of them clerks in the department. We are aware, of course, of the greatly increased work of the State Department. Their work has been increased possibly 200 or 300 per cent on account of the unfortunate conditions in Europe and also in Mexico. Our Government has had to act for all of these belligerent nations, or practically all of them. Communications are made between these belligerent nations through the State Department here. New commercial treaties will necessarily have to be made after the war is over. In addition to that, millions of dollars of claims are being filed by the citizens of this country with the State Department, particularly by reason of the war in Mexico and also on account of the war in Europe. It is necessary to tabulate these claims. It is necessary to see that these claims are supplied with proper proof, for although the claims can not be presented for payment at this time, it is necessary that the proof shall be gotten up, so that when the claims are presented for payment all of the proof necessary will be at hand. The State Department felt that 94 additional employees should be allowed. Your committee has allowed less than 50 per cent of that amount, or 42 employees. It did so because it felt that possibly the State Department might be able to keep their work current and perform the additional work with this increased force, especially since they are allowed $30,000 in a lump sum for emergency clerical service and also have the privilege of drawing on the sum appropriated at the last Congress for the protection of Americans abroad.

It was stated by the Secretary of State and by other officials in the State Department that this work would be more or less permanent in character—that it would last at least for many years to come; but your committee felt that while it was proper to allow these additional clerks on the permanent roll it was also wise and judicious to allow them in a separate paragraph in the bill, so that Congress might in the future know exactly what number of clerks were allowed and for what purpose, and might be able to give consideration to the question of whether or not they should be continued and carried for future years.

The committee also recommends an appropriation of $26,350 to take care of 23 clerks in the Office of Naval Operations. That bureau was created by the last naval appropriation act, and it is one of the most important bureaus in the Navy Department. It has to do with messages from the fleet, with the movement of ships, target practice, and other duties. The head of the bureau, Admiral Benson, is the Acting Secretary in the absence of the Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. The work of that bureau is necessarily, to a large extent, confidential in its nature. It has been performed and is being performed at this time by clerks detailed from other bureaus in the department, but those clerks are badly needed in the places from which they were detailed, and having been provided by law, it is necessary to provide an active permanent force for the Bureau of Naval Operations. Your committee felt that under all the circumstances, in view of the importance of the bureau, it was proper to allow the estimate as it was submitted.

Fifty-two thousand and fifty dollars is allowed for additional examiners and other employees in the Patent Office. This takes care of a great many promotions of examiners in the Patent Office under a law which was passed in this House only a week or two ago, having come over to this House from the other end of the Capitol. It was necessary, of course, that this appropriation be made in order to comply with the wishes of Congress.

For the promotion and development of foreign and domestic commerce with Central and South America, your committee recommends an increase of $75,000, and I am frank to say there is some doubt in my mind as to whether or not the committee, viewing the importance of this work and its great value, has really allowed a sufficient amount.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, in addition to its large clerical force, now has an appropriation of $250,000, if I remember correctly. This appropriation, if allowed, will give them $325,000—$50,000 increase for the promotion of commerce throughout the world and $25,000 increase for the promotion of commerce in Central and South America.

I am firmly of the opinion that no work that has been done during this administration has probably given better and more direct results than the work being performed by this great bureau under the very efficient and able administration of the great Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield, who has made his department a living and active force in this Government, assisted by Dr. Pratt, the chief of the bureau. I could, if I had the time, give you gentlemen some facts which have been stated to the committee, showing exactly what this bureau has accomplished, because this bureau was able to come before the committee and give positive and actual instances showing what had been done in securing contracts abroad for manufacturers and business men of this country—contracts, many of them, amounting to more than a million dollars; in one case a contract for 40,000 bales of cotton for Russia, covering a period of five continuous years, and, in another case, the opening of the coal trade in Spain to the coal mines of this country by securing the removal of a preferential tax of $1.20 per ton for coal in favor of Great Britain. As a result of the work of this bureau, it is a fact that coal is now being shipped to Spain in as large quantities as it is possible to secure the ships to transport it.

Another result is the building of a great smelter, now in process of construction, in this country for the purpose of taking care of crude tin ore to be brought to this country direct from Bolivia. Heretofore we have been importing about 50,000,000 tons of the manufactured product from Europe, but through the activities of this bureau in the future we will be able to import annually into this country 30,000,000 tons of raw tin from Bolivia to be smelted in this country, giving employment to labor and at the same time resulting in a mutual exchange of our manufactured products to the extent of its value, at least.

The committee allowed an increase for the Steamboat-Inspection Service of $52,500, to provide for additional assistant inspectors. It is not necessary for me to discuss the importance of that recommendation. For years the Steamboat-Inspection Service of this Government has been hampered because of the want of sufficient assistant inspectors to perform proper service inspecting steamboats. There are about 9,000 boats which have to be inspected every year, and the committee was informed that it has been a practical impossibility to give proper and careful inspection to all of these boats so as to safeguard human life and prevent great disasters upon our lakes and rivers, and your committee felt that they were unwilling to take the responsibility of denying to the Steamboat-Inspection Service this increase, which was so earnestly asked in the interest of human life and human safety.

There have been a number of reductions brought about by estimates submitted to the committee, notably one in the Treasurer's office. There is recommended in this bill a reduction of 24 employees, with salaries amounting to $30,840. At the last session this force in the Treasurer's office was reduced by 26 persons, with an annual compensation amounting to $21,200. Thus for this year and the ensuing fiscal year the whole force in this office will have been reduced in all by 50 persons, with an annual compensation of $52,040. That result has been brought about by the cooperation of the Treasurer's office with the Division of Efficiency created by law. It has been brought about without affecting the efficient and proper administration of the work of the Treasurer's office.

On the other hand, it is stated that the work is more current to-day than it has been in many years. In fact it is entirely current, if I remember correctly. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer stated that this reduction could be made, and that the work would be carried on during the ensuing fiscal year without difficulty or hindrance.

Another notable reduction is in the Post Office Department, and I wish, just for a moment, to comment upon the work that has been done in this great department, because it seems to me that the action of the Postmaster General, once a distinguished Member of this House, ought to prove an example to the other departments of this Government. It shows what can be accomplished by an earnest and persistent effort at a reorganization and reclassification of the work in the various departments here in Washington in the interest of economy and good service.

Acting in harmony and cooperation with the Division of Efficiency, a committee on personnel was appointed by the Postmaster General, and the work of that department has been reorganized and reclassified without doing any injustice to any of the employees of that department, and with the result of putting it upon a more efficient basis. Efficiency ratings have been established. Clerks who were performing a large amount of service, and receiving small pay for it, have been promoted and given the proper pay for their service. Some clerks, who have been getting a larger amount of pay and doing less work, have been demoted, and all of the clerks in that department, in so far as has been possible, have been put upon a proper and fair basis, with the result that the present bill carries a reduction of 37 employees in the clerical force of that great department, and a total reduction in the expenses of the department of $42,615. For the current year 1916, there was made a reduction of 81 persons, with a total pay amounting to $75,680, making a total reduction for the two years of 118 persons and $118,295 in annual expenses.

Since the present Postmaster General has been at the head of the department there has been a total reduction of 172 employees with salaries of $144,940 per year; and, as I have stated, this reduction has been brought about, not by any injustice to any employees in the department, not by depriving the Post Office Department of a sufficient number of clerks to do the business in the department here in Washington, but by a reorganization and reclassification of the service in the department. It has not resulted in the general removal of clerks, because the Postmaster General has followed the policy of not filling vacancies when they occur, so as to work no injustice to anyone.

This reduction has been made despite the fact that the work in that department has increased vastly in the last two or three years, not only in the natural increase of postal business, but also by reason of the Postal Savings System and the Parcel Post System, which have added greatly to that work. As I have stated, the Post Office Department has been thoroughly reorganized, new and effective methods of transacting business have been introduced that have not only conduced to economy but have accelerated and brought up to date the executive work of the service, and standards of efficiency have been established for the persons employed in the departmental service in accordance with the requirements of section 4 of the legislative, executive, and judicial act for the fiscal year 1913.

In establishing the salaries in the Post Office Department the Postmaster General has acted upon the theory that the National Government should be a model employer; that it ought not to exact from the clerks more service than it is willing to pay for; and in establishing these efficiency ratings, in promoting clerks or in the demoting of clerks where it was found proper and fair and necessary, consideration has been given to the amount paid for similar services in private employment; and in every case the effort has been made to give the clerks in that department from 15 to 30 per cent more than they could secure for similar services in private employment. I believe with the Postmaster General, that this Government ought to be a model employer. I believe that this Government ought to pay to the clerks and to all who perform work for it a fair and reasonable compensation for the work which they do perform. I am not much in sympathy with statements which we have seen to the effect that this Government has been unfair to the clerks. I know there may possibly be individual cases that might be pointed out, among the more than 300,000 employees of this Government, where some injustice has been done; it would be singular indeed if, out of all this number, there were not some such cases; but when everything is considered I believe that this Government has been fair to the clerks. Certainly there has been no disposition on the part of Congress to be unfair. The clerks work now seven hours a day. They have 30 days' annual leave——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think an executive official who exercises his influence to coerce employees of the Post Office Department, to prevent them petitioning Congress, and prevent them making an effort to adjust what they believe to be their grievances, is doing what is fair to those clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know of any department official of this administration who has undertaken to restrain clerks from presenting petitions.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Then the gentleman does not know what has happened in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not believe that those who work for the Government should be denied the right to petition Congress, and to petition their representatives for a redress of any grievances which they may have or which they may think they have. Nor, as I say, do I know of any particular official who has sought to deny them that right. In addition to what I have stated, the clerks have 30 days' sick leave on full pay, if necessary. They have numerous holidays, and during three months in the summer they are given a half holiday.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has stated that the clerks in the Post Office Department have 30 days' sick leave.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If they are sick.

Mr. KEATING. Does that apply to all the executive departments? I am asking for information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It applies to all the executive departments in the city of Washington.

Mr. KEATING. In the city of Washington the employees of all executive departments get 30 days' sick leave in addition to their other leave of absence.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do, provided they are sick, and if they are not sick they do not expect it and do not get it.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman knows, what steps are taken by the different department officials to determine whether or not the employee is sick when he asks for a sick leave?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. KEATING. Is there a uniform rule in the various departments by which clerks may know the amount of sick leave to which they are entitled and how it may be obtained?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think not; I think that rests wholly in the discretion of the chief of the particular bureau in which they are employed. It may be shown by a personal statement, or by a visitation, or by a doctor's certificate. I do not think there is any uniform rule established in the departments with reference to what proof shall be furnished. Usually a doctor's certificate is required.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has been petitioned by any clerks or employees of the Post Office Department in regard to grievances that they desire to have adjusted?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not recall any petition submitted to me by any clerk of the Post Office Department or any statement to that effect.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. For the gentleman's information, I will say that I have had. I have been to the Post Office Department to secure redress for them, and I have in my time represented labor unions, but I never yet met anyone so cold-blooded and brutal in their attitude toward employees as are the officials of the Post Office Department to their employees.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not familiar with the experience that the gentleman from Illinois has had, nor do I agree with his statement as to the officials of that department. I have had many petitions in the form of letters and by word of mouth from postal carriers, rural carriers, and other employees in the service back in my home State. I have presented these matters to the Post Office Department, and uniformly, without a single exception, they have always been given careful and patient consideration, and in many cases some of the grievances have been corrected.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I wish to state further, for the information of the gentleman, that the excuse as given by the Post Office Department is a matter of economy, that in some instances they did not have the money to do such things with; but on examination I find the economy practices place the burden on the backs of the hardest-worked and poorest-paid employees; and that seems to be the practice of the Government for years, both under Republican and Democratic administrations. Such treatment does not satisfy me, no matter what the brand of the administration is. I expect to state the facts as I find them, no matter what administration it is under or what brand of administration conducts the affairs in a bureaucratic or plutocratic manner.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that the Appropriation Committee in making up this bill, in all the increases that have been given, have considered first the clerks in the various departments who are drawing the least pay. Every increase in this bill applies to clerks and messengers of the Government, and not to those drawing the high salaries.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do not want to be misunderstood. My position is that this Congress has responded liberally to these things when put before it. They even reinstated some post-office collectors and letter carriers that had been deposed, but the postal officials in another way put back what Congress had undone at that time, and in face of the fact that Congress had gone on record in its desire as to what should be done by the administration of that department. But the postal officials took such action that it impaired, if not entirely destroyed, what Congress had done. I gave my attention to these things, examined them thoroughly, and have been to the President in regard to the matter. That is just how serious the complaints seem to me. I made a trip from Chicago to Washington on account of it. I will say that it was quite without avail. I might as well have done nothing about it at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not time, I regret to say, to enter into a discussion of the administration of any department in the city of Washington. My purpose is to present to the House this bill and to give the House the benefit of such information as I have concerning its various provisions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to ask the gentleman two questions with reference to the so-called Borland amendment. Was there any hearing on that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There was none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was there any recommendation of any member of the Cabinet, head of any bureau, or chief of any bureau?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. None was presented to me or any member of the committee, so far as I know.

Mr. AUSTIN. Was there any statement as to whether the Government would save anything or was there any discussion in the committee on the subject, if I may be permitted to ask?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would hardly be proper to say what occurred in committee, but I will state that the subcommittee did not consider the matter in any aspect. In fact, it was not presented to it. I can state that because publication has been made of that fact.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does this bill provide for a reduction of the clerical forces of the various bureaus of the Government as a result of the proposed increase in the hours of labor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This bill in its preparation did not take into consideration the Borland amendment or provide for any reduction that might be had, if any does occur, by reason of the possible adoption of that amendment on the part of Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then it does not mean a reduction of expenditures?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say whether it would or would not mean a reduction of expenses, if it were adopted. I can only say that this bill was prepared without contemplation on the part of the committee that such an amendment would be adopted or even considered by the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. If this Borland amendment be adopted, it does not mean the dropping of a single clerk, because this bill carries appropriations for the clerks in the departments as estimated, regardless of this proposed change in the law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does not, so far as this bill is concerned, unless the House should choose to drop them.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COX. In response to the answers of the gentleman from Tennessee, if the Borland amendment obtains and finally becomes a law, as I am informed, it will affect, approximately, about 30,000 clerks in the city of Washington.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So I understand.

Mr. COX. The gentleman feels, does he not, that this would be true, that if they are required to work eight hours instead of seven the thirty-odd thousand clerks would be able to do more work, and whether or not it would be the means of discharging any employees it would enable the department to do the work that it is now required to do without taking on any additional employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly. There is no room for argument over the proposition that if those 30,000 clerks, more or less, are required to work a half hour longer each day, and they actually do work a half hour longer each day, with the same degree of efficiency and the same degree of energy that they now discharge their duties, it would undoubtedly result in reducing the number of clerks required for the performance of the same work.

Mr. COX. Whether it would reduce the number of clerks now at work or not, would it not have this tendency, to enable the department to do its work in the future without taking on additional employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I say, with the premise that they work with the same degree of efficiency and energy, with the half hour in addition, it would undoubtedly, it seems to me, have that effect.

Mr. COX. We have a perfect right to assume that they would work with the same degree of efficiency if they were required to work a half hour extra?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I presume so, although I have seen statements to the contrary.

Mr. COX. I take it for granted that no clerk would refuse to do his duty.

Mr. AUSTIN. Just one other question. The hours of labor in the departments were increased a half hour a few years ago, and they are now working a half hour more than they did a few years ago as a result of that change. Was the clerical force reduced in a single department of the Government, and was there actual saving of money?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am very sorry that I am not in a position to answer the question of the gentleman, because I have not had opportunity to look into the fact, and I was not a Member of Congress at that time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they working seven hours now or seven and a half hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are working seven hours, with a half hour for lunch. The hours are from 9 o'clock in the morning to 4.30 in the afternoon, with a half hour for lunch.

Mr. MADDEN. That makes seven actual hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. As a matter of fact, this legislation is not responsive to the request of any of the heads of the departments who have these employees under them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only state that no head of a department or any bureau in the Government has ever talked to me or talked to the committee when I was present about this subject. I do not know, of course, what may have been said to other members of the committee.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think it is a good business proposition to increase the hours of labor of employees in the various departments of the Government, and is it fair with the hours now arranged and controlled by these various departments without taking the matter up and discussing it with them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I think the proposition is open to discussion as to whether or not it would result in a real saving. Personally I have never felt that eight hours a day was too much work for any man.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Granted that that is true.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know that in private employment the employees work fully eight hours a day and usually more. I want to say to the gentleman, so that I may make myself clear on the matter, that I did feel when the matter was presented—and I say this because of the publications which have been made already—that it was a matter of sufficient importance to receive very careful consideration, and that we ought to hear from those affected, both on the one side and the other, as to the advisability of making the change before taking any action.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think that at this time it would be wiser to forego this legislation until the heads of these departments could be consulted, and then, after consultation with them, bring in such measures as they would support and as to them seemed wisest to govern the employees under their direction at this time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I do not know. As I say, on the broad principle of seven hours or eight hours of labor a day, I do not——

Mr. RAGSDALE. That is not the proposition I am asking the gentleman about.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say that it should be taken into consideration; that the hearings have disclosed in many of these departments and bureaus that many clerks are sometimes required to do overtime work.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That has been shown to be the case in many bureaus—not regularly but at times. On the other hand, it might be stated that if they worked eight hours a day it might not be necessary to perform any overtime work.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, while that is true, does the gentleman think that the heads of these departments should not regulate the hours of their clerks, should not have the power to make them work for a longer period of time, to make them work overtime at will, than it would be to control the regulation of their clerks?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think, of course, the departments ought to have some discretion as to control of the time of the clerks. Under the present law the departments have such discretion.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Having that discretion at this time and being able to make their employees work overtime at their will in order to serve the public needs as they see it, would the gentleman say it is wise, without any recommendation or consultation with them, to take away their power to control their clerks and make an arbitrary law which is not at all responsive to their wishes as to the way in which the time shall be divided?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that in the consideration of the amendment and the question of the advisability or nonadvisability of its passage not only the clerks here in Washington should be considered but the general interests of the taxpayers and the Government should be considered also.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure that Congress has no disposition to unduly tax any clerks in the departments here in Washington.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Absolutely none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly the committee did not so intend.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But the question is not merely a question of expense or a question of taxation; it is a question of wisdom, and is it wise to take the control and power from the various heads of departments, upon whom we must lean in order to secure service, and deny them the right to extend the hours of labor when they need it most and make an absolutely inflexible law here that takes the power and control of their time away from them? Would the gentleman advocate that without first having a discussion with those departments and secure their opinion upon it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I am frank to say to the gentleman that I would not approve of a proposition to make an inflexible rule and take away from the heads of departments the power of administration. So far as the hours of clerks are concerned, and so far as this Borland amendment is concerned—and it will of course at the proper time be championed by its author—I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it does not seek to do that in all fairness. It simply provides that there shall not be less than eight hours of service performed in the executive departments by clerks here. It does take from the heads of departments the power to reduce the hours below eight hours and requires eight hours as a day's work.

Mr. RAGSDALE. And therefore while it does that does not it put the heads of departments in the position that they can not in one day extend the time for a certain period of time and shorten it in another day in order to treat the employees fairly; that they can not use time as needs may arise now by way of emergency in the departments, but they will be controlled by this inflexible rule, whereas under certain conditions they may not need the full time of these employees, and on other days they will need overtime, and this will make it absolutely impossible to hold back any of that time on other days because they require them to work for eight hours each day?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is never shortened now to less than seven hours except for holidays in midsummer.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Therefore, I ask the gentleman, does he think it is necessary and to the best interests of the service in the departments that we should enact this legislation without having the opinion of the various heads of the departments to whom we must look for efficiency in this service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman it is a matter to which I had never given any consideration or thought until the matter was presented here a short time ago, and I am not fully prepared to say to the gentleman what will be the effect if this amendment should be adopted. I want to say for myself personally that I have always favored a fair, adequate, and just compensation to clerks and to everybody who works for the National Government. I want to repeat what I said a moment ago, that I believe our Government should be a model employer and that it should be careful in all cases to pay to those who work for it and perform services for it a fair and adequate compensation for the service they are rendering.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. LONDON. Would the gentleman vote to change the conditions of labor affecting 30,000 people without consulting them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can only refer the gentleman to my vote on that proposition when it was presented, as appears in the newspapers, and I have always said——

Mr. LONDON. Would the gentleman vote to change the economic conditions of 30,000 men without consulting them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I certainly would not without giving them the most serious consideration. If it had reference merely to a change of hours, I can see how it would be possible with entire justice to employees to increase the hours by one-half hour over and above what they are now, but I feel, of course, that there are considerations which must be taken into account when this is done, and it is for that reason, as I stated a while ago, that I would have preferred that hearings could have been had and everyone for and against the proposition could have been given an opportunity to present their reasons.

Mr. LONDON. Does the gentleman realize that in the case of a private employer an attempt to increase the hours of labor without consulting the men involved would be immediately followed by a strike?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have seen that happen.

Mr. LONDON. You have seen that happen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is it not also true that by increasing the hours of labor you do not necessarily increase the productivity?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not in all cases.

Mr. LONDON. Not in all cases; and if the work is of a kind which exhausts a man in seven hours you are not going to make him more efficient and more productive by compelling him to labor eight hours instead of seven?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. By prolonging the hours of labor you do not necessarily increase the efficiency of labor, do you?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not necessarily; no. In some cases where the hours of labor already are long you decrease the efficiency rather than increase it.

Mr. LONDON. And it has been the experience in all industries that all accidents happen during the last hours of the day and during the last hours of the week, because the men are exhausted and worn out. It is also true that if you increase the hours of labor without consulting them and without giving them a hearing you will justify them in refusing to perform the work with as much devotion as they did before.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is possible.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the gentleman to say that oftentimes these employees work beyond the seven or eight or nine hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I stated that the hearings disclose that there was some overtime work in many of the bureaus.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask if, when they work overtime, they get any additional pay?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do not.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the gentleman think if this salary is fixed upon a certain number of hours of labor and you limit the number of hours of labor that it would be equally as fair to put a proviso there that if they worked overtime they would get the additional amount of pay?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is done in the case of certain employees in the Government Printing Office, where the eight-hour rule applies. I want to say to the gentleman, in connection with this overtime work, it has been stated that the clerks who do that work do it willingly and cheerfully. So far as the hearings disclose there is an earnest cooperation among the clerks in the city of Washington; and they have never, so far as I am informed, refused to do this overtime work whenever it was necessary to complete the work on hand during the day.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that during the Spanish-American War the clerks in the War Department and in the Navy Department worked overtime for a period of six or eight months and then later brought in a claim for compensation and it was refused by Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That was the case.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I have been in committee and have just come in. I am very much interested in this proposition. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Did the committee investigate how the eight-hour provision works as to postal employees—letter carriers and that class of employees in the Postal Service—to whom the eight-hour law is applicable?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee did not. As I stated before, there were no hearings before the committee on this proposition. It was a matter that was not considered by the subcommittee and not presented by way of estimates to the subcommittee that had cnarge of this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. It is said that the Department of Justice requires a longer day than some of the other departments in Washington. Did you hear from anybody in that department as to how that rule worked?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Absolutely no hearings were had. No one appeared before the committee in regard to it.

Mr. HOWARD. I have heard it stated that the Department of Justice as a department required 30 minutes' more service per day than any of the other departments here. Have any of those employees been heard from, in one way or another, either by letter or in actual hearings before the committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They have not.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the gentleman incorporated in his remarks upon this subject the many divisions of the country in which the eight-hour day is recognized as a day's work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not, because it was not my purpose at this time to discuss the so-called Borland amendment. I presumed that that amendment would be taken up for discussion, and full, fair, and free discussion had upon it when it was reached in the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman think that with the information which the committee has had before it this committee would be justified in adding to the great army of "neurasthenıacs" and nervous wrecks that this Government work here has wrought on these employees and ask us to adopt the Borland amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not aware, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, that there are any nervous wrecks or "neurastheniacs" in the departments.

Mr. HOWARD. Mental exercise and continuous labor produce "neurastheniacs."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is, of course, a great deal of superannuation. With that exception, the heads of the departments and the heads of the various bureaus state that their clerks are up to a very high degree of efficiency.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman in charge of the bill states that no opportunity was given to anybody to be heard in connection with the Borland amendment. Is it not an unusual thing for any committee of Congress to undertake to do what seems to be a rank injustice to a large class of people without giving them a chance to be heard or giving anyone else a chance to inform the committee on the subject?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to qualify the statement of the gentleman. The gentleman stated that the Committee on Appropriations gave no one any opportunity. The committee never denies to anyone a hearing. The Committee on Appropriations would have gladly given anyone an opportunity to appear before the committee and be heard upon any proposition involved in the bill. The only reason why there were no hearings granted by the subcommittee on this particular proposition was because it was not contemplated or suggested to the subcommittee.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Do we understand, then, that some one slipped this through without any consideration by the committee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was adopted by the committee after consideration. The gentleman has no doubt read about that in the newspapers of Washington and knows how it came about.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it contemplated that if this amendment is adopted the number of employees of the Government in the city of Washington shall be diminished, or shall they be required to do more work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That will depend altogether upon the effect of the amendment, if it should be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman tell me what the result will be if the amendment is adopted, as to whether the number of employees will be diminished automatically by its adoption?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sorry to say I am unable to give the gentleman any positive information on that point except to say that there will, of course, be no automatic reductions. As I stated a while ago, if a half hour is added to the work of 30,000 employees of the Government, and the employees work with the same degree of enthusiasm and energy for the additional half hour that they have shown hitherto during the hours now required, they will undoubtedly do more work, and, unless the Government work is greatly increased, it would necessarily result in a reduction of the present force.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention particularly to the Civil Service Commission. I do not know how many employees they have had in that commission, but it is constantly reported that they are from three to six months behind in their work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is a fact; and the committee has taken that fact under consideration and allowed them additional clerks under this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to ask this question of the gentleman: If any other departments of the Government are behind, as the Civil Service Commission is, would that increase of the hours of labor result in the discharge of employees, or merely in their catching up with the work of the departments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That would depend entirely upon the work done and the amount to be performed.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield; yes.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask if the gentleman would explain why it was necessary to add two examiners in the Civil Service Commission? The gentleman did not touch upon that question. That is on page 3 of the report.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that this is not an increase of salary, but an increase in the force of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. KING. Yes. I would like to ask the gentleman why it was necessary to increase the force?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. From the simple fact that the work in the Civil Service Commission is very much behind, from three to six months, and it was stated by the Civil Service Commission that unless an increase of force was given, by the end of another fiscal year they would probably be a year behind if their work continued in its present proportions; and the committee felt that in order if possible to make their work more current and to secure reports and appointments more promptly, these additional clerks should be allowed.

Mr. KING. Did they explain to the committee why they were behind?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Their explanation was that they did not have a sufficient number of examiners here in the office to keep up with the work; that the work had considerably increased by reason of additional employees being put under the civil service, fourth-class postmasters, and so forth, and that the force in the office had not been increased correspondingly.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think that if it had been shown to the committee that, of all the commissions sitting in the city of Washington and interjecting rules and regulations in place of the law of the country, this commission is, as a matter of fact, one of the most tyrannous and diabolical commissions that ever sat in the city of Washington, would the committee have been in favor of this increase?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee would only have been in favor of the increase in the event it considered it was necessary. I can not subscribe to the sentiments of the gentleman, with reference to the commission. These gentlemen have endeavored to do their duty under the law. They are capable, splendid citizens and faithful public servants. As a matter of fact, the Civil Service Commission, as we all know, has had a great increase of work. Fourth-class postmasters all over the country have had to be examined, and vacancies continue to occur in fourth-class post offices and rural routes, more than 40,000 in number, and in various other activities of the Government. There are over 300,000 employees of the Government now under civil service, and the work of the Civil Service Commission has been very largely increased in the last few years. As a matter of fact, the Civil Service Commission asked an increase of 27 in its force, and stated that this increase was necessary in order to bring up their work. But your committee has allowed only about 10 additional employees.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to follow the gentleman from Tennessee, but I have not been able to hear all of his remarks. I want to ask him if it has been stated, or can be stated, that it is true when we hear that the clerks in the departments, since the outbreak of the European war, have had more duties to perform than prior to that time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That has undoubtedly been the case with some of the departments, but, of course, the conditions brought about by the war in Europe have not affected all of the departments in that way.

Mr. HULBERT. Have there been any protests among the clerks of any department against working overtime without compensation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. On the contrary, the heads of departments and bureau chiefs, as I have stated, have uniformly said that where overtime work has been necessary, in order to do important work on hand, the clerks have always willingly and cheerfully performed overtime work, and no one has ever been heard to complain.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for an innocent question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; if it is very short.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska. There are other gentlemen desiring time, and I have already taken up more time than I intended.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to know whether or not the committee reporting the so-called Borland amendment was actuated by a desire to economize at the expense of the clerks, or were you actuated by a belief that the clerks were overpaid for the time they put in?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not state what actuated the gentlemen who voted for the Borland amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. You do not know the motive behind the reporting of the Borland amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not. I do not attribute any sinister or improper motives to those who voted for it.

Mr. REAVIS. Nor I. I am simply trying to ascertain, if the gentleman please, whether or not it was a matter of discussion before the committee, that the motive for that amendment was to economize at the expense of these clerks, or whether the committee thought the clerks were being overpaid for the time actually given to the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Speaking for myself, I have never thought that the clerks here in Washington are overpaid under their present salaries. There may be some individual cases where clerks are overpaid, because the hearings disclose that a considerable number of the clerks here in Washington are superannuated and are not now performing a fair amount of service for the compensation received by them. But in the main that is not true.

Mr. REAVIS. The Borland amendment does not seek to rectify overpayment to individuals, but attacks the entire service, does it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. By increasing the number of hours required.

Mr. REAVIS. Was there any discussion before the committee as to the motive behind that amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course under the rules I would not be permitted to state to the House, or to anyone else, what occurred in the committee. There was some discussion, but of course under the rules I am prohibited from making any statement as to what any particular member of the committee may have said.

Mr. REAVIS. Was it the expressed opinion of the committee that these clerks are overpaid for the hours which they now actually give?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have just stated to the gentleman that I can not, of course—I am sure the gentleman will appreciate that fact—violate the rules by undertaking to give expression to anything that might have been said or to any expression that might have been given by any member of the committee or by the entire committee.

Mr. REAVIS. I understand the gentleman to state that it is his opinion that, as a rule, the clerks are not now overpaid for the service actually rendered?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is my opinion, although I want again to qualify that with the statement that there are some clerks who have been in the service a long time, who are now old, and who are drawing pay which the heads of the departments, and particularly of bureaus, say they are not fully capacitated to earn by reason of the fact that they are not up to a fair standard of efficiency; but with the exception of some of these superannuated clerks I am frank to say to the gentleman that I do not think the clerks are overpaid.

Mr. REAVIS. Then in the judgment of the gentleman the purpose accomplished by the Borland amendment is economy on the part of the Government, and not to fix the hours commensurate with the pay?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not think that was the purpose of the author of the amendment. He is, of course, more than capable of answering that for himself.

Mr. REAVIS. There could only be one of two purposes of this amendment, either that we were overpaying them for the work they now do or that we are trying to economize. I can conceive of no other motive behind the amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman, as I attempted to make plain a while ago, I believe that when you take into consideration the number of hours that the clerks are required to work each day, when you take into consideration the amount of annual leave, when you take into consideration the amount of sick leave granted them when necessary with full pay, when you take into consideration the number of legal holidays, and when you take into consideration the fact that they are allowed a Saturday half holiday for practically three months every year, I do not believe that the National Government, as a general proposition, is paying for the services of its clerks less than private employers pay. On the contrary, I believe that in the major portion of the cases you will find, if you will investigate it, that the National Government is dealing justly with its employees, and as was stated before the committee, particularly with reference to the Post Office Department, it is paying from 15 to 30 per cent more for the services rendered than is paid for similar services in private employment.

Mr. REAVIS. Does that belief account for this amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not able to speak, of course, for those who voted for the amendment in the committee.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Just for a short question.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman referred a while ago to superannuated clerks. Is any progress being made in any legislation looking to a system of retirement of the inefficient servants of the Government?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not on the part of the committee. Of course, bills have been introduced in Congress upon the subject, but I do not think that any of them have ever been reported out. Those bills are not referred to the Appropriations Committee. I think the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has jurisdiction of them.

Mr. FESS. Why is not some legislation of that character put into operation? Why is not there some legislation looking to equitable treatment of the superannuated employee?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That I can not tell the gentleman, because I am not a member of the committee to which they have been referred. Of course, that would open up a very long discussion, and, with all due deference to the gentleman, I have not the time at my disposal to enter upon that. I have already infringed upon the time of other gentlemen who desire to address the committee; but I can not refrain from saying that I do not think the gentleman is exactly accurate in his statement, or at least in the intimation that the National Government has not been fair to the superannuated employees. Some of them are drawing the highest salaries paid to clerks. The present law provides that the heads of the departments shall demote those clerks, as they have the power to do, to the lower salaries, and promote the more efficient and those capable of rendering the greater service, so that they shall receive the higher salary, and of course that is fair.

Mr. FESS. Of course, I did not mean that the Government had been unfair. I meant that employees reach a stage where they are not so efficient as they formerly were, as the gentleman stated a moment ago, and they are not being dropped from the service. The Government would not want to do that. Now, why is there not some plan by which they could be relieved when they reach that point and still be properly treated?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have already stated that that is a matter over which the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction. I do not want to be understood as saying that these clerks have reached the point where they are incapable of performing any service; but they are incapable of performing as efficient and as high a degree of service as they once could; and in all such cases the heads of departments and the various bureaus are seeking to do exact justice to all of the clerks by demoting them to the lower salaries and promoting the more efficient to the higher salaries.

Mr. FESS. That is a field of legitimate legislation, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely; although I might differ with the gentleman as to the legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it true that in some departments of the Government employees are now working eight hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Are those employees receiving higher salaries than those who now work seven hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman know whether those who are now working eight hours are doing easier work than that which is being done by those who work seven hours, and whether there has been any injustice practiced in the past against men who are now working eight hours?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course information of that kind could only be obtained by a thorough investigation, and possibly by hearings. As I have stated a number of times, the committee have had no hearings upon the proposition, and I am therefore not in a position to give the gentleman any information other than that which he no doubt already has. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill makes provision for a separate division in the Census Bureau, to be known as the Division of Cotton and Tobacco Statistics. For a number of years Congress has appropriated more than $200,000 for the collection of statistics of cotton produced and the amount on hand at various periods in the year. A few years ago Congress passed what is known as the Cantrill law, which was intended to serve the same purpose for the growers of tobacco, and since that time the Census Bureau has endeavored to collect accurate statistics as to the amount of leaf tobacco on hand for the benefit of those whose energy and labor produces this great American staple. This information is intended for the benefit of the growers of these two great agricultural products, which add so much to the wealth of this Nation. Those who buy the product have no difficulty in securing accurate information as to the amount in the hands of the growers. Knowing the acreage, it is an easy matter to estimate how much will be produced; and having at their hands the facilities for knowing how much is in the hands of the manufacturers, they have been able to know just how much of the product is on hand when they come to make their purchases. The farmer has had no such advantage, and he has had to rely upon those who buy from him in order to arrive at a knowledge as to the supply on hand and the price for which the product of his labor should sell in the open market. The collection of these statistics is intended to put the tobacco and cotton grower in possession of the information which those who buy from him gain through private sources. Knowing the amount of the product in the hands of the manufacturer, he is enabled to definitely determine what would be a fair price for that which he has for sale. He will no longer be compelled to rely for such information upon those who naturally desire to buy his product at the lowest possible price.

As I have stated, while more than $200,000 has been spent each year in the collection of these statistics, no separate division under the direct charge of a competent official who has a knowledge of and a sympathetic interest in these two great agricultural products has ever been created. The adoption of this provision will mean that the Director of the Census will be empowered to place at the head of this division a competent and expert official, who will be held responsible for the full and accurate collection of these statistics and the dissemination of this information among the farmers who are engaged in the production of cotton and tobacco. One objection to the Cantrill law is that it only provides for semiannual reports. If this provision is adopted, then quarterly reports will be made, and this information will be furnished to the tobacco grower at a time when it is most needed by him in fixing the price of his product. In the interest of both the tobacco and cotton grower, I trust that this provision will be adopted by Congress.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to place in the RECORD my hearty approval of the recent action of the House in passing for the third time what is known as the good-roads bill, extending Federal aid to the various States in the building of good roads. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have been an earnest and, I may say, an active advocate of legislation of this kind. At two previous Congresses the House has passed a bill extending Federal aid for the building of good roads, but each time the bill has failed to pass the Senate. I trust that the present measure will share a better fate and will finally become a law.

The interest of all the people demands that our roads shall be improved, and I hope that Congress will at this session appropriate money to aid the States and the counties in the building up of a great and permanent system of highways all over the country.

The National Government is seeking to help the farmer through the Agricultural Department, the laboring man through the Department of Labor, and the business man through the Department of Commerce. It is improving our waterways in the interest of commerce and lower freight rates. These activities are to be highly commended; but I want to see our Government do something more for the farmer, the business man, and the laboring man—in fact, for every man, woman, and child in this broad land of ours—and that is to give some aid in the building of good roads. It can build no more lasting monument to the progressiveness of the present generation than by helping to establish a perfect system of good roads. We read in history of the power and glory of ancient Rome; of the great prowess of its armies; of its wide dominions, stretching from sea to sea; of its coliseum and its schools of art and science, which made Rome the mecca for students and travelers from every land; but the only tangible evidence of its civilization which exists to-day is the Appian Way, evidences of which can be seen all the way from Rome to the southern Scottish border. We study the history of Napoleon and wonder at his rapid rise from a poor Corsican boy to the position of master of Europe. We marvel at his genius and the master military hand with which he wrought his will; but the only thing of value which he left to his country and which exists to-day is the system of splendid roads in France, the foundation for which he laid while emperor of his country. So I repeat, our Government can render no more lasting and valuable service to the present and future generations than the establishment of good roads.

The prosperity of a country depends in the largest measure upon its transportation facilities. Adequate transportation facilities are essential to a full and complete development of our farms, our mines, and our factories. There was a period in the early history of our country when the National Government gave material aid in the building of highways. Many millions of dollars were spent in this way, covering a period of perhaps 50 years. But when the era of railroad building began the idea that the railroads would furnish all the transportation needful for the development of our commerce quickly grew and the National Government ceased to give attention to the building of highways. It turned its attention to the new form of transportation, and in the early stages of railroad development vast sums of money were spent and immense grants of public lands were made to foster and promote the building of our transcontinental railways. Wonderful progress has been made by the railroads. There are now about one-quarter of a million of miles of railway in this country, and I have seen the statement that freight rates have been reduced until they are now only about one-tenth of what they were in the earlier stages of railroad development. But notwithstanding that, their annual gross receipts amount to the sum of $3,000,000,000, which shows the immense volume of our commerce.

No one would for a moment discount the importance and necessity of railroads in the upbuilding of a country. They are absolutely essential to its highest development. Progress and prosperity follow in the line of their march. But we must not forget that all of the products of our farms and forests and a great number of our mines and factories must be hauled over our public roads before they reach the place of shipment or consumption. It is important, therefore, that our roads should be brought to a high state of improvement in order to reduce the cost of hauling as much as possible.

The Bureau of Public Roads estimates that more than 350,000,000 tons are hauled over our public roads each year, with an average haul of about 8 miles and at an average of 23 cents per ton per mile. This would amount to $644,000,000.

The same authority states that it would not cost more than 13 cents per ton per mile if all of our roads were improved as they should be, and this would result in a saving to the people of this country of considerably over one-quarter of a billion of dollars every year. The farmer is not accustomed to figure in the cost of his team, his harness, and his wagon as a part of the annual expenses of his farm. But, when he stops to reflect that they are a legitimate part of his farming expenses, and when he considers how quickly bad roads will wear out a team of mules, and how often they cause him to buy a new set of harness and a new wagon, and also how they prevent him from hauling large loads easily and quickly to market, he will begin to realize how much a bad system of roads really costs a community.

One of the most serious problems confronting our Nation to-day is the tendency of our boys and girls to leave the healthful and independent life on the farm in order to seek homes in the overcrowded cities. Our rural communities are being depopulated, while our cities are being overpopulated to such an extent that many are unable to find remunerative employment. Much has been said and written as to how this condition can be remedied. I will tell you the most effective way to stop it. Build good roads; make it more pleasant and profitable to live on the farm. Make it easier for those who live in the country to get around. Make it possible, in bad weather as well as in good weather, for them to leave their homes either with the product of their labor or on pleasure bent, and you will find that the boy and the girl will prefer to stay on the farm rather than seek employment in the cities. The result will inevitably be a more healthful, a more virile, and a more independent citizenship, and a more productive and a wealthier Nation.

So I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that Congress can confer no greater and more lasting benefit upon all the people than by extending aid to the States in the building of good roads. They make for a higher civilization and a better citizenship. They will increase the productiveness of the Nation, and thereby add to its great wealth. They will enhance the value of our farm lands. They will improve our schools and churches, and add to the happiness and prosperity of all the people.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for some days in the recent past the newspapers of the country were filled with more or less exaggerated accounts of alleged disagreements between the President and members of his party in Congress as to whether, in the light of the attitude of certain of the warring countries of Europe relative to the practice and effect of arming merchantmen, it were wise, expedient, or proper for the administration or Congress to warn or prohibit American citizens from sailing on armed merchant vessels bound for the theater of war.

On this side of the House we are not supposed to be informed as to what transpired at conferences between Democratic Members of Congress and the President. The public has, however, been enlightened as to certain views held and expressed by those who participated in these conferences through a certain letter written to the President by Senator STONE, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and the President's reply thereto. These letters are as follows:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Since Senator KERN, Mr. FLOOD, and I talked with you on Monday evening I am more troubled than I have been for many a day. I have not felt authorized to repeat our conversation, but I have attempted, in response to numerous inquiries from my colleagues, to state to them, within the confidence that they should observe, my general understanding of your attitude.

I have stated my understanding of your attitude to be substantially as follows:

That while you would deeply regret the rejection by Great Britain of Mr. Lansing's proposal for the disarmament of merchant vessels of the allies, with the understanding that Germany and her allies would not fire upon a merchant ship if she hauled to when summoned, not attempting to escape, and that the German warships would only exercise the admitted right of visitation and capture, and would not destroy the captured ship except in circumstances that reasonably assured the safety of passengers and crew, you were of the opinion that if Great Britain and her allies rejected the proposal and insisted upon arming her merchant ships she would be within her right under international law.

Also that you would feel disposed to allow armed vessels to be cleared from our ports; also that you are not favorably disposed to the idea of this Government taking any definite steps toward preventing American citizens from embarking upon armed merchant vessels.

Furthermore, that you would consider it your duty, if a German warship should fire upon an armed merchant vessel of the enemy upon which American citizens were passengers, to hold Germany to strict account.

Numerous Members of the Senate and the House have called to discuss this subject with me. I have felt that the Members of the two Houses who are to deal with this grave question were entitled to know the situation we are confronting, as I understand it to be.

I think I should say to you that the Members of both Houses feel deeply concerned and disturbed by what they read and hear. I have heard of some talk to the effect that some are saying that, after all, it may be possible that the program of preparedness, so-called, has some relation to such a situation as we are now called upon to meet.

I have counseled all who have talked with me to keep cool; that this whole business is still the subject of diplomacy, and that you are striving to the utmost to bring about some peaceable adjustment, and that in the meantime Congress should be careful not to "ball up" a diplomatic situation by any kind of hasty and ill-considered action. However, the situation in Congress is such as to excite a sense of deep concern in the minds of careful and thoughtful men. I have felt that it is due to you to say this much.

I think you understand my personal attitude with respect to this subject. As much and as deeply as I would hate to radically disagree with you, I find it difficult for my sense of duty and responsibility to consent to plunge this Nation into the vortex of this world war because of the unreasonable obstinacy of any of the powers upon the one hand, or, on the other hand, of foolhardiness, amounting to a sort of moral treason against the Republic, of our people recklessly risking their lives on armed belligerent ships. I can not escape the conviction that such would be so monstrous as to be indefensible.

I want to be with you and to stand by you, and I mean to do so up to the last limit; and I want to talk with you and Secretary Lansing with the utmost frankness—to confer with you and have your judgment and counsel—and I want to be kept advised as to the course of events, as it seems to me I am entitled to be.

In the meantime I am striving to prevent anything being done by any Senator or Member calculated to embarrass your diplomatic negotiations. Up to the last you should be left free to act diplomatically as you think for the best to settle the questions involved. I need hardly say that my wish is to help, not to hinder, you.

With the highest regard and most sympathetic consideration, I have the honor, Mr. President, to be Very sincerely, yours, WM. J. STONE.

To this letter the President replied as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I very warmly appreciate your kind and frank letter of to-day, and feel that it calls for an equally frank reply.

You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. I think the country will feel no uneasiness about my course in that respect. Through many anxious months I have striven for that object, amid difficulties more manifold than can have been apparent upon the surface, and so far I have succeeded. I do not doubt that I shall continue to succeed. The course which the central European powers have announced their intention of following in the future with regard to undersea warfare seems for the moment to threaten insuperable obstacles, but its apparent meaning is so manifestly inconsistent with explicit assurances recently given us by those powers with regard to their treatment of merchant vessels on the high seas that I must believe that explanations will presently ensue which will put a different aspect upon it. We have had no reason to question their good faith or their fidelity to their promises in the past, and I for one feel confident that we shall have none in the future.

But in any event our duty is clear. No nation, no group of nations, has the right, while war is in progress, to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war; and if the clear rights of American citizens should very unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action, we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course should be.

For my own part, I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect. The honor and self-respect of the Nation is involved. We covet peace, and shall preserve it at any cost but the loss of honor. To forbid our people to exercise their rights for fear we might be called upon to vindicate them would be a deep humiliation indeed. It would be an implicit, all but an explicit, acquiescence in the violation of the rights of mankind everywhere and of whatever nation or allegiance. It would be a deliberate abdication of our hitherto proud position as spokesmen, even amid the turmoil of war, for the law and the right. It would make everything this Government has attempted and everything that it has accomplished during this terrible struggle of nations meaningless and futile.

It is important to reflect that if in this instance we allowed expediency to take the place of principle the door would inevitably be opened to still further concessions. Once accept a single abatement of right, and many other humiliations would certainly follow, and the whole fine fabric of international law might crumble under our hands piece by piece. What we are contending for in this matter is of the very essence of the things that have made America a sovereign nation. She can not yield them without conceding her own impotency as a Nation and making virtual surrender of her independent position among the nations of the world.

I am speaking, my dear Senator, in deep solemnity, without heat, with a clear consciousness of the high responsibilities of my office and as your sincere and devoted friend If we should unhappily differ, we shall differ as friends, but where issues so momentous as these are involved we must, just because we are friends, speak our minds without reservation.

Faithfully yours, WOODROW WILSON.

One paragraph of Senator STONE's letter is particularly clear and forceful. After stating that he understood the President was not favorably disposed to the idea of this Government taking any definite steps toward preventing American citizens from embarking on armed merchant vessels, he said among other things:

I find it difficult for my sense of duty and responsibility to consent to plunge this Nation into the vortex of this world war because of the unreasonable obstinacy of any of the powers upon the one hand, or, on the other hand, of foolhardiness, amounting to a sort of moral treason against the Republic, of our people recklessly risking their lives on armed belligerent ships. I can not escape the conviction that such would be so monstrous as to be indefensible.

In his answer to this letter of Senator STONE, it will be noted that the President, among other things, wrote as follows:

For my own part, I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect—

And so forth.

Those are fine, bold words. Taken from their context and adopted as a rule and guide for the conduct of our foreign affairs, there is no one under the flag but would applaud them. When, however, we take into consideration the conditions under which they were used, the situation to which they were addressed, I am at a loss to know whether the picture they conjure up is that of Ajax defying the lightning or Falstaff on parade.

"For my own part I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect." Fine words! Splendid sentiments! How unfortunate it is that the President could not have uttered and acted upon them three years ago and in the period that has intervened during which time the administration has done little else than not only consent but actually connive at and weakly and supinely submit to the abridgment of the rights of American citizens in Mexico. Those were rights clearly defined by solemn treaty; fundamental rights questioned or challenged by none. The right to live, to liberty, residence, and the conduct of lawful business.

What a difference between the fundamental and treaty rights of American citizens in Mexico and the alleged rights for which with fine Falstaffian fury it is now proposed to contend. The exercise of those rights could by no possibility of itself create a condition of friction, misunderstanding, or conflict. They were the natural, normal, and reasonable rights which all the world recognizes, which all nations agree to respect, and all nations are expected to maintain. On the contrary, the alleged rights to which the President refers are in some of their aspects to a greater or less degree challenged by all the world. Their exercise is not necessary to the comfort or happiness of any citizen, and even under the most favorable circumstances imaginable is likely to end disastrously for the individual and embroil the Nation in war over the foolhardy adventure of some philandering citizen.

What a pity the President could not have put in action his fine words of to-day instead of calling on our citizens, miners, merchants, and professional men in Mexico to abandon their rights, their homes, and their property. How about the rights of colonies of American farmers in Mexico, who by their toil, energy, and sacrifice had transformed desert places into fruitful fields, established their homes, and enhanced the honor of the American name. Without an effort to protect them worthy of the name all these were abandoned to their fate and given notice to leave, with the inference, which ripened into fact, that they would secure no protection if they remained.

"I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens," said the President. How about the rights of American citizens in and about Tampico—men, women, and children. Their rights were not only abridged; they were wantonly denied. With full knowledge on the part of the administration, as shown by the official records, of the desperate plight of these people, they were over the repeated protests of the American naval commander abandoned to the mercy of an infuriated, drunken, outrageously abusive, insulting, and murderous mob. But for the presence of English and German ships and the prompt action of English and German commanders, hundreds of Americans—men, women, and little children, abandoned to their fate by direct orders from Washington—would have been the victims of the lust and fury of a Mexican mob. As it was, they were for hours tortured by the fear of death, and worse, and American men were compelled to stand by helpless and defenseless, in the presence of their wives and little ones, while every foul epithet and every unprintable insult the Spanish tongue is capable of uttering was heaped upon them.

Fifty thousand Americans lawfully and peacefully living in Mexico were warned by their Government to abandon their rights and compelled to leave their homes and property because their Government refused to afford them protection. American women were outraged. Hundreds of Americans, many of them wearing the uniform of their country, were killed; scores of them on our own soil. Millions of American property was destroyed or confiscated. The American flag was spit upon, dragged in the streets, trampled into the dust. American rights were everywhere flaunted, American prestige destroyed, American honor besmirched. And after all this, no part of which has been remedied to this day, the President tells us that he "can not consent to any abridgment of American rights."

What are the alleged rights for which the President contends so stoutly, in regard to which he thunders so valiantly in the index? Whatever definition may be given them, with a view of misleading and confusing the public mind, with a view of dodging or clouding the real issue, the alleged rights contended for are the right, if it be a right, to travel on a ship carrying guns more effective by far than any gun carried on the greatest man-of-war in the old days of the armed merchantmen; guns that would be effective against not only submarines, but unarmored cruisers; guns that are intended and expected to be used to deny the right and prevent the act of search and seizure; guns which make the merchantman in fact an effective fighting ship, equipped to fight, instructed to fight, and expected to fight.

I do not intend to go into a detailed discussion of the right of merchantmen to arm. I am perfectly willing to admit that a century ago, and before, merchantmen were quite generally armed, and that our courts held in the early part of the last century that a merchantman had the right to arm for defense. It is true that at that time, and even later, some of the authorities held that a merchantman was justified in using his defensive armament, if he was attacked, in an offensive way, even to the extent of overcoming and capturing his enemy, if possible. It is true that all this arming of merchantmen was a part of the general practice of the time of carrying arms on shore and sea. It was the practice of the sea, comparable to the practice on shore in turbulent times, of going armed, and under which people of consequence never ventured abroad save with their armed guards.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman have in his possession Mr. Lansing's note that was made public on the 12th of this month, in reference to that very question, and from which the President's letter to Mr. STONE differs?

Mr. MONDELL. I have Mr. Lansing's note to the powers relative to the disarming of merchantmen, if that is the note to which the gentleman refers, and will refer to it a little later if I have time.

Mr. FESS. I think the letter from Mr. Lansing is confirmatory of the gentleman's position.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is, and I thank the gentleman for calling it to my attention.

The arming of merchantmen was a custom that had no legal origin that any man may lay his fingers on, but one that grew out of the general turbulence of the times, the lack of authority and control in the open places on land and sea. France never recognized, in modern times, the right of a merchantman to arm. Toward the middle of the last century, with the suppression of piracy, the arming of merchantmen gradually fell into disuse. Then came the declaration of Paris, in 1856, and the abolition of privateering, so far as the signatories to that declaration, which included the present European belligerents, are concerned. As a matter of fact, the principle of the abolition of privateering was accepted by all the world.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. TEMPLE. I notice the gentleman says that all belligerents were signers. There were seven nations present when the declaration of Paris was passed. There are more than seven belligerents now engaged in war.

Mr. MONDELL. There is not a nation on earth now that recognizes the right of privateering, whether they signed the declaration of Paris or not. All the major belligerents did sign, as I recall. Does the gentleman contend that we uphold the right of privateering because we did not sign the declaration of Paris? Certainly not.

The abolition of privateering following the suppression of piracy removed the reason and excuse for arming merchantmen, and from the close of our Civil War until very recently guns, except occasionally a small 1-pounder for salute, were practically unknown on merchantmen. The fact is that the civilized world never unitedly accepted the doctrine of armed merchantmen. France refused to do so. So far as there was general agreement, it was limited to the right to arm against attack by piratical or irregular craft, including privateers. There never was definite agreement among the nations that merchantmen could arm or as to the extent to which a merchantman's armament could be used, but it was seldom, if ever, of a character to make it effective or tempt its use against the regular warcraft of the enemy. Furthermore, in the olden days such armament was never furnished by the Government. That would have constituted the merchantman a ship of war.

But I am not inclined to combat the claims of those who insist that an armed merchantman if attacked by any vessel of the enemy has the right to use its armament as it sees fit to ward off, beat off, or defeat the attack. The more valiantly and persistently and emphatically that kind of a right is contended for the more clearly, definitely, and compellingly is it evidenced that any neutral country that has regard for the lives of its citizens or for its own peace or honor will keep its citizens off such ships. [Applause.] No nation that desires to escape complications that may lead to war over mere definitions, finespun as a spider's web; over questions of fact which, involving issues touching national pride, become of such stupendous moment as to lead to bloody and devastating war, will allow its citizens to thus wantonly and needlessly expose themselves to harm and their nation to the horrors of war. [Applause.]

I have just referred to the fact that after the suppression of piracy, the abolition of privateering, the establishment of order throughout the world, the arming of merchantmen for any purpose, save occasionally for salute, ceased. The custom having ceased, the rule based on custom may with reason and logic be said to have ceased to be operative. In fact, it was not revived for more than half a century, or until just before the outbreak of the present European war. It was the 26th of March, 1913, 16 months before the breaking out of the present European war, that Mr. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the British Admiralty, made a statement in the House of Commons in regard to a "new method" proposed by Great Britain, as it was alleged, "for the protection of the British trade." This statement was as follows:

I now turn to one aspect of trade protection which requires special reference. It was made clear at the second Hague conference and the London conference that certain of the great powers have reserved to themselves the right to convert merchant steamers into cruisers, not merely in national harbors but, if necessary, on the high seas. There is now good reason to believe that a considerable number of foreign merchant steamers may be rapidly converted into armed ships by the mounting of guns. The sea-borne trade of the world follows well-marked routes, upon nearly all of which the tonnage of the British mercantile marine largely predominates. Our food-carrying liners and vessels carrying raw material following these trade routes would, in certain contingencies, meet foreign vessels armed and equipped in the manner described. If the British ships had no armament they would be at the mercy of any foreign liners carrying one effective gun and a few rounds of ammunition. It would be obviously absurd to meet the contingency of considerable numbers of foreign armored merchant cruisers on the high seas by building an equal number of cruisers. That would expose this country to an expenditure of money to meet a particular danger altogether disproportionate to the expense caused to any foreign power in creating that danger. Hostile cruisers, wherever they are found, will be covered and met by British ships of war, but the proper reply to an armed merchantman is another merchantman armed in her own defense. This is the position to which the Admiralty have felt it necessary to draw the attention of leading shipowners. We have felt justified in pointing out to them the danger to life and property which would be incurred if their vessels were totally incapable of offering any defense to an attack. The shipowners have responded to the Admiralty invitation with cordiality, and substantial progress has been made in the direction of meeting it as a defensive measure by preparing to equip a number of first-class British liners to repel the attack of an armed foreign merchant cruiser. Although these vessels have, of course, a wholly different status from that of the regularly commissioned merchant cruisers, such as those we obtain under the Cunard agreement, the Admiralty have felt that the greater part of the cost of the necessary equipment should not fall upon the owners, and we have decided, therefore, to lend the necessary guns, to supply ammunition, and to provide for the training of members of the ship's company to form the guns' crews. The owners on their part are paying the cost of the necessary structural conversion, which is not great. The British mercantile marine will, of course, have the protection of the Royal Navy under all possible circumstances, but it is obviously impossible to guarantee individual vessels from attack when they are scattered on their voyages all over the world. No one can pretend to view these measures without regret or without hoping that the period of retrogression all over the world which has rendered them necessary may be succeeded by days of broader international confidence and agreement than those through which we are now passing.

It will be noted that Mr. Churchill called attention to the alleged fact that "certain of the great powers had reserved to themselves the right to convert merchant steamers into cruisers not merely in national harbors, but if necessary on the high seas."

He claimed that there was good reason to believe that a considerable number of foreign merchant steamers were so equipped that they could be rapidly converted into armed ships by the mounting of guns. He did not claim that any were then carrying mounted guns. After calling attention to Great Britain's vast shipping and carrying trade, he said their vessels engaged in trade might in certain contingencies meet with foreign vessels thus armed, and therefore, he argued, the British ships should be armed in order to protect themselves against foreign ships which he said he had reason to believe carried guns which, under certain conditions, they might mount.

Mr. Churchill then went on to say that the Admiralty had felt it necessary to draw the attention of leading shipowners to this alleged condition of affairs and to point out to them what he conceived to be the dangers of life and property if their vessels were incapable of offering defense. To these advances of the Admiralty, Mr. Churchill told the House of Commons, the shipowners had "responded cordially," and a number of first-class British liners had, he said, been armed "to repel the attack of an armed foreign merchant cruiser." The British Government, Mr. Churchill told the House, was supplying the guns and ammunition for these ships and providing for the training of the members of the ship's company to form a gun crew.

And thus armed and equipped with the best of modern guns, capable of shooting with great rapidity and remarkable accuracy and of sinking any ship, except one heavily armored, at any distance less than 5 or 6 miles, these so-called defensively armed merchantmen are sailing the high seas. No wonder Mr. Churchill stated "no one can pretend to view these measures without regret or without hoping that the period of retrogression all over the world which has rendered them necessary may be succeeded by days of broader international confidence and agreement than those through which we are now passing."

Thus was launched upon the high seas a class of armed merchantmen which not even the First Lord of the British Admiralty ventured to justify under international law or usage, for there is no rule of international law authorizing such armament, much less the orders affecting them.

Those are the armed ships and those like them which are sailing under the Italian flag, which raised the present controversy. And that is the kind of fighting ship, armed and equipped at the expense of the powers at war, under their orders to fight, and certain to fight to the limit if overhauled and ordered to stand by and submit to search and seizure, relative to which the President strikes a pose of mock heroism in support of his declaration that Americans shall be allowed, which means encouraged, to ride on them.

I am not assuming to pass on the question of the proper status of such vessels as I have referred to. A simple statement of the situation makes it very clear to anyone that the controversy is not only serious but that it distinctly has two sides. Under the rules of international law a belligerent ship has, under certain conditions, the legal right of search and seizure of neutral ships and cargoes. A neutral ship resists the order of a belligerent warship to stop and submit to search at her peril; and no neutral ship would think of resisting an order of that kind made by a war vessel of any kind of one of the nations at war. Hence the passengers are safe, though the ships may be halted and searched.

Likewise, if all the merchant ships of the belligerent powers submitted to search and seizure by a warship of the enemy, including submarines, and the humane rule insisted upon by our Government and agreed to by the central powers, that crew and passengers should be placed in a position of safety before the vessel was destroyed, were adhered to, there would be little more danger on a belligerent than on a neutral merchantman. But if the merchantman is armed, ordered, expected to, and does resist and fire upon either a submarine or any other ship of war, the most humane intent possible to imagine on the part of the attacking ship does not remove the danger to which the passengers would be exposed through the perfectly legitimate attempt of the enemy ship to capture the fighting and resisting vessel.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In case we do what the gentleman suggests, would that classify the vessels as auxiliary naval vessels?

Mr. MONDELL. What suggestion is the gentleman referring to—that we warn our people not to sail on an armed ship?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. My suggestion is contained in a bill which I introduced that provides that all citizens carrying American passports should be prohibited from riding on an armed merchantman of the kind referred to sailing from our ports.

Mr. FESS. Would that classify them as auxiliary naval vessels?

Mr. MONDELL. It would have no effect whatever on the classification of a ship. Its effect and action would be on the citizen to prevent him traveling on an armed ship, which if called upon to lay to by a ship of war will fight, thereby endangering life, even though the challenging ship does not go beyond or contravene any of the laws of war.

Mr. FESS. Would that be a change of international law during the progress of the war?

Mr. MONDELL. It would not, and if I have time I will discuss that feature of the matter.

The dangers to which passengers on armed merchantmen are exposed from submarines, even when the submarine is acting within its acknowledged rights as a ship of war, has been apparent to our State Department since the beginning of this controversy over submarines. The very first inquiry in the case of the destruction of a merchant ship by a submarine has been, "Was she armed?" "Did she use her guns to defeat search and seizure?" In other words, was she within her rights? In the case of the Lusitania it was made clear that she carried no arms and that there was no resistance and therefore her sinking was not an act of war, but plain brutal murder, unjustified and unjustifiable.

While Germany has not frankly and completely disavowed that act, the German Government has given assurances that nothing of the kind shall occur again in the case of an unarmed or unresisting vessel, and offered to do what little in the way of reparation for that frightful crime can now be done.

In some of the other cases where merchantmen have been torpedoed and sunk by submarines, conditions and circumstances have not been so clear and unquestioned. There have been some cases of reported attempt to escape by flight, some cases of attempt to ram. While these acts necessarily endanger the lives of passengers, they do not, of course, of themselves warrant sinking without removing crew and passengers. Thanks to the efforts of our Government, for which I wish to give all due credit, it has been definitely agreed that the lives of the crews and passengers of unarmed merchantmen shall be protected. Further, Germany has recently assured our Government that even in the case of an armed and resisting merchantman every reasonable effort will be made to save the lives of the passengers. In this connection, it is interesting to note that on the 18th of last January the Secretary of State addressed to foreign powers a communication, as follows:

It is a matter of the deepest interest to my Government to bring to an end, if possible, the dangers to life which attend the use of submarines as at present employed in destroying enemy commerce on the high seas, since on any merchant vessel of belligerent nationality there may be citizens of the United States who have taken passage or members of the crew in the exercise of their recognized rights as neutrals. I assume your Government is equally solicitous to protect their nationals from the exceptional hazards which are presented by their passage on merchant vessels through these portions of the high seas in which undersea craft of the enemy are operating.

UPHOLDS SUBMARINES' USE.

While I am fully alive to the appalling loss of life among noncombatants, regardless of age or sex, which has resulted from the present method of destroying merchant vessels without removing the persons on board to places of safety, and while I view that practice as contrary to those humane principles which should control belligerents in the conduct of their naval operations, I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this practical branch of warfare on the high seas.

In order to bring submarine warfare within the general rules of international law and the principles of humanity without destroying their efficiency in their destruction of commerce, I believe that a formula may be found which, though it may require slight modification of the precedent generally followed by nations prior to the employment of the submarines, will appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of all the belligerents in the present war.

Your Government will understand that in seeking the formula or rule of this nature I approach it of necessity from the point of view of a neutral, but I believe that it will be equally efficacious in preserving the lives of noncombatants on merchant vessels of belligerent nationalities.

BASIS OF PROPOSALS.

My comments on this subject are predicated on the following propositions:

First. A noncombatant has a right to traverse the high seas in a merchant vessel entitled to fly a belligerent flag, to rely upon the observance of the rules of international law and principles of humanity, and if the vessel is approached by a naval vessel of another belligerent, the merchant vessel of enemy nationality should not be attacked without being ordered to stop.

Second. An enemy merchant vessel, when ordered to do so by a belligerent submarine, should immediately stop.

Third. Such vessel should not be attacked after being ordered to stop unless it attempts to flee or to resist. In case it ceases to flee or resist, the attack should be discontinued.

Fourth. In the event that it is impossible to place a prize crew on board of an enemy merchant vessel or to convoy it into port, the vessel may be sunk, provided the crew and passengers have been removed to a place of safety.

OBSTACLES FOR SUBMARINES.

In complying with the foregoing principles, which, in my opinion, embody the principle rule, the strict observance of which will insure the life of a noncombatant on a merchant vessel which is intercepted by a submarine, I am not unmindful of the obstacles which would be met by undersea craft as commerce destroyers.

Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war, and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offense against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

POWERLESS IN DEFENSE.

The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

INNOCENT LIVES AT STAKE.

It would therefore appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal right, which may be denied on account of new conditions.

STAND ON QUESTION SOUGHT.

I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration, conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

As I understand it, the entente allies have declined to disarm their ships, as thus suggested by our Secretary of State. They insist on carrying the arms and armaments provided by their Governments, served with the crews trained by their Governments. These guns are of a character that make them more effective against submarines than would be the guns carried on the mightiest dreadnaughts. They are of a character which, according to the former First Lord of the British Admiralty, are effective against armed cruisers. No such armament has ever been approved by international agreement. No such armament has been used by any nation, except some of those now at war, and by them but recently and without asking or receiving the assent of other nations. These ships are expected to fight if ordered to submit to seizure and search. They are prepared to fight, and they have more than an even chance in such a naval combat, as they are likely to be exposed to. The central powers contend that these ships are not peaceful merchantmen, but armed enemy ships and therefore not entitled to that treatment assuring the safety of crews and passengers which they promise will be accorded to unarmed merchantmen. What do we propose to do about it?

As I view the matter, both sides are in the wrong. There never was a rule of international law which justified the kind of arming or the purpose of arming now contended for and insisted upon by England. On the other hand, there never was, and in my opinion there never will be, a time when the killing of noncombatants without attempt to save them was justified, even though they were foolhardy enough, or unfortunate enough, to be in the midst of contending forces. "You can not change the rule during the progress of the game," it has been said, or as the President puts it, "No nation or group of nations has the right, while war is in progress, to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war." That is very true; but the alleged rule now invoked that merchantmen may be allowed to carry and use arms against warships is not in mitigation of, but calculated to increase the horrors of war, to multiply them.

So far as there is any definite rule it has been changed by the acts of the entente allies, by reason of the character of the armament used, by reason of its being furnished by the Governments, through the training of crews and the issuance of orders by the Government to use the guns to prevent seizure.

The right to arm merchantmen in the manner I have referred to can not be dignified as a principle, nor has it ever been agreed to by the nations.

Nobody on this side of the water, however, is proposing to alter or disregard any principles unless it may be the President himself, who seems to have overlooked the fundamental principle of our Government that the issue of war is placed in the hands of the representatives of the people and can not be legally or properly taken from them. [Applause.] Anyone who would create a condition or attempt to create a condition which might force the hand of Congress into a declaration of war or into an acceptance of the gage of battle is doing a reprehensible, an unpatriotic, a wicked, or a treasonable thing, depending upon the character of the act and the position of him who performs it.

Nobody in Congress, as far as I know, on either side has any disposition to attempt to change a rule of international law; but outside of the clear and patent fact that both parties across the water to the present controversy relative to armed merchant ships and their status are, to a certain extent, wrong, no two men can be found anywhere who can agree as to just what the rule of international law is as applied to the present situation. We are not called upon to define any rule of international law except as it affects our citizens, and all that anyone in Congress has proposed is that in this conflict of opinions and clash of contending forces we shall not unnecessarily, willfully, rashly, or wickedly be brought within the consuming flames of the conflict. [Applause.]

What may happen to British liners armed with modern rifles of considerable caliber and tremendous power, and with orders to use them should Germany carry out her declaration relative to such vessels—to treat them, if they resist capture, as ships of war—can not affect us in our relations with either of these powers unless our citizens become involved.

Many acts in the course of this war, beginning with the breach of the neutrality of Belgium, have been contrary to treaties, civilized usages, and international understanding, but our Government has not seen fit to protest or interfere. Why, then, this sudden insistence upon the part of the administration that we shall endanger the lives of American citizens by becoming a party to a situation created by the greed and savagery of warring nations in a way which may involve us in the conflict?

When and how did it become so tremendously sacred and important an American right to be privileged to ride on an armed ship, equipped and intended for hostilities, proposing to travel through a hostile zone in time of war? Such a ship is expected to fight. It proposes to fight, and in a fight of any kind at sea some one is sure to get hurt. In the case of such resistance an enemy ship would be justified in at least using the force necessary to stop, to capture, and to board the merchant vessel. Assuming the attacking vessel keeps within all the rules of war, danger to the passengers is very great and some loss of life is certain to occur. All of which makes it clear that the arming of merchantmen is not, under present conditions, justifiable, and if anyone persists in doing it our people should not place themselves in danger by sailing on such ships.

Why does not our President proclaim, defend, and insist upon the right of American citizens to travel on powder trains? Why not have a crusade in defense of the unquestioned constitutional right of the American citizen to bear arms as against the multitude of our laws and ordinances, limiting that right and in effect actually depriving the citizen of it?

I can understand how the thoughtless and heedless, the uninformed or emotional, might throw hat in air at any bombastic declaration that the rights of American citizens must not be abridged, without regard to the conditions that brought it forth or to which it was intended to apply. But when anyone fully informed contends that an American citizen has a right which should not be denied, curtailed, or abridged, to travel on a ship armed to fight, purposed to fight, proposing to fight, and bound into the regions of war, at the present time and under present conditions, I am compelled to believe that the one so proposing and insisting is either playing politics with the national honor or is disposed to embroil the Nation in war. [Applause.]

I wish to repeat that no one, so far as I know, is proposing to change or modify international law. Even if we knew what it was in the case presented we would not expect by any act of ours to change it. We do, however, feel that it is our duty to prevent American citizens from plunging into danger and taking the chance of embroiling the Nation in war by doing something the abstract right to do which does not exist and the effect of which would be to subject us to grave danger.

Let the contending powers determine what the rule is so far as they are concerned. It is the duty of innocent bystanders to stand aside while the controversy goes on. We shall not attempt to change the rules so far as they affect the active players, but it is clearly our duty to protect the bleachers and the grand stand, at least the part of it we are responsible for, from reckless pitching, wild batting, and dangerous fouls. [Applause.]
